BOOK TWO OF THE MADELEINE TRILOGY

M A X S E B A S T I A N

“A woman could take a man without really giving herself into his power.
Rather she could use this sex thing to have power over him.”

- DH Lawrence, Lady Chatterley's Lover

One

Before he left for work the next morning, Hugo stood for a moment, gazing down on the bed and the sleeping form of his beautiful wife. Had last night really happened? Had she really revealed a hint of a wild side to him? Or confessed about her crush? That she liked to watch him have sex in the apartment across the street?

Had she really made out with one of her friends at work?

This was Madeleine, the same Madeleine he had dated, had fallen for almost instantly, had married. The same Madeleine who had shown no sexual interest in anything for so long that he couldn't remember. This prim, proper, pretty girl who lay before him as though it was just another Wednesday morning.

Had she really admitted fantasizing about a man who was not her husband?

And had he revealed that he found such a thing hot?

Hugo had to leave the bedroom before the tingling between his thighs became the kind of burning need that would make him late for work.

At work, he couldn't stop dwelling on it. It felt unreal—halfway through the day, he started thinking maybe it was unreal. That it hadn't happened.

As the morning wore on, he wanted to text her just to say what an incredible night it had been, just making love to her like that, time and time again before they'd collapsed asleep. But every time he picked up his phone, doubt froze his hand.

What if the cold light of day had made her ashamed of what they'd talked about while making love? What if she was embarrassed now, about revealing her secret to him? And what if she thought he was disgusting?

He was trembling a little on the way home from work, but along with the fear and the trepidation, the strongest thing he felt was hope: that the way they'd been able to talk about things, like never before, would continue.

He'd never heard from Madeleine about what she thought about during sex, about what her fantasies were. It seemed a strange thing after five years of marriage. How had he never been so curious as he was now about something like that?

He was also a little nervous that she hadn't texted him once that day. Maybe she was just exhausted. Well, he hadn't texted her, either, had he? Even so, his paranoia helped him imagine all kinds of bad scenarios.

He had to hope that things would pick up as they'd left them the previous night. She'd made a step past that old darkness, she was finally happy, and ready for a new era of sexual openness and exploration with her husband.

He wasn't holding her back any longer from experiencing the pleasures of life.

Hugo was almost giddy with anxiety and excitement as he stepped off the subway, walked to their street, their apartment building, their apartment.

Opened the door.

"Hey honey!"

Merely her voice and the ebulliently cheerful tone it projected was enough to make Hugo hard as a rock even before he really laid eyes on her. And she looked incredible in a simple summer dress, short enough to show most of her thighs, a gentle glow about her pretty face as though she'd been thinking dirty thoughts again.

"Good day at work?"

"Oh, you know, so-so."

It was a little awkward to begin with. Hugo wanted desperately to talk about what had happened the previous night, and he sensed that Madeleine might be the same way. But it was a little embarrassing now. Had they both really revealed what they had?

They both ate supper as though nothing different had happened at all. Madeleine had cooked a wonderful meal of fajitas and salad, but Hugo didn't enjoy it quite as much as he would normally.

The only sure-fire sign that anything was different was that the blind slats were no longer firmly closed—they were open sufficiently to see the apartments across the way.

At last, with food out of the way, Hugo glanced overtly at the building across the way, and said with a suggestive smile: "So how was your day off?"

"Good," Madeleine grinned a touch bashfully.

"Have you been watching a certain somebody out the window?"

Hugo found himself thickening just to ask her that question.

She shrugged. "Only a little."

He pulled himself up from the sofa, wandered over to the windows. There was no sign of anyone in the bedroom they'd seen the threesome in the previous night. One floor up, the college students seemed to be having what appeared to be the early signs of another party.

"They never seem to stop, those students," he said.

"No."

"They are in college? They do study?"

"I'm not sure," she said quietly, now pulling herself up from the armchair, following him to the windows, only making her progress much slower, more tentative, almost ready to flee if things went sour.

"They're pretty well off, aren't they? Trust funded, you think?"

"They'd have to be to be college students living in a place like that."

"Your man must be fairly well off, too. Not home right now?"

Madeleine glided to his side, so close he could smell her sweet floral perfume. God, she was hard to resist.

“My man?”

“Your crush.”

She stared at the windows for a moment or two, and then looked at him as though to try to work out whether he was joking, whether he was being ironic, whether by the cold light of day he was actually happy for her to watch and fantasize about a man who lived across the street.

She said: “He went out for dinner.”

Madeleine blushed furiously, apparently knowing the details of her crush’s schedule.

Hugo felt a jolt of burning jealousy slide through his chest—and yet he saw the fire in his wife’s eyes at the mere thought of this crush, and it excited him.

“But you watched him for a while before he went out?” Hugo said, and now flashed her a mischievous grin, at once reassuring her it was still all fine, and also reminding her that he actually quite liked the idea that she had a schoolgirl crush that was stoking up her hormones like never before.

“Maybe,” she said, still blushing profusely, unable to lie to her husband.

Then, as if to distract from her embarrassment, she moved away from him, taking up position sitting on the window seat, leaning up against the wall.

“You’re very calm about it all,” she said.

He shrugged, still not quite knowing how to put his own feelings into words. “There’s no risk that you’ll leave me for him, is there?”

“Of course not.”

“So then. Maybe I just like the fact that this crush of yours gets you all horny.”

“You do?”

“And you are horny, aren’t you, honey?” he smiled.

“You’re a bad man, Hugo.”

“You are, aren’t you?”

“I am now.”

“Show me.”

Her hands slid down her body, over her curves, a little too uncertain to be sensual. Yet the fact that she was entertaining ideas of displaying herself for him, of embracing his attraction toward her rather than merely laughing it off or scoffing at his complements, was irresistibly sexy.

“You like watching me,?”

“Adore it.”

“Maybe I should let you, then,” she said, pushing her knees up so that her flimsy dress rose on her thighs, and he could see so much of her smooth pale flesh—and then her purple panties.

Hugo took up position opposite her on the window seat, leaning up against the opposite wall some 10 or 15 feet from her.

“So... what should I do?” she asked, nervous, blushing, uncomfortable. So unbelievably sexy.

“Take off your dress.”

Hugo tried to sound strong, authoritative. Helping her to contend with her own uncertainty about this.

“You think anyone can see?” she whispered, hands hesitant as they clutched the hem of her dress.

He glanced through the blind, which was a little more open than perhaps was entirely safe. “Does it matter?” he asked, and felt a throb between his thighs as his blasé response prompted a quiet gasp from Madeleine.

Was this a step too far?

Then trying to reassure her, he said: “Those students are all too wrapped up in their party to notice you, I would think. And none of the other apartments have lights on.”

Madeleine was looking across the street with a mischievous glint in her eye that almost invited someone from the other building to look. Hugo felt his cock harden further, even before she slowly began to draw up the thin material of her dress to reveal her upper thighs.

Then she wriggled to get the dress past her behind, and her panties were now out in the open, though sitting side-on to the window would hardly allow witnesses much to see. Her husband had to keep himself from openly drooling.

“You asked for it, Mister,” she said, and he felt himself tingling all over as she continued to draw her dress up, unveiling her pale abdomen and shapely stomach, and then the bottom edge of an unmatched plain black bra.

She hesitated again, as though doubt had crept back in, and glanced out into the night again, checking for observers.

“God, you look amazing,” Hugo breathed, not even really meaning to vocalize his thoughts, though it was rewarded with another bashful smile from his pretty wife.

Emboldened by his words, she wrapped her arms around her stomach and the bottom of her dress, then suddenly whipped the garment up and over her chest and head, revealing her modest but exquisitely rounded breasts quietly enclosed in black cotton.

She said, “I’m not really sure what to do...”

“Relax,” he said, resisting the temptation to release his hardness, his hands quietly in his lap, pressing against his bulge, hiding the contact. “Do what you’d do if I wasn’t here—if the blind was closed like normal.”

“But you are here. And the blind’s open.”

“You want me to leave?”

She shook her head. Then she looked him straight in the eye, completely serious, and said: “Tell me what you want to see.”

Hugo felt his hardness throb. Was she asking him for general ideas on what he wanted her to do, or exact instructions? Was she asking him to tell her what to do? That was so unlike anything that happened in real life. Maybe it was something enticingly different for her.

He took a deep breath, and adding an edge of authority into his voice, said: "I want to see you touching yourself, Madeleine."

He could see her swallow involuntarily, but then freeze up, like a deer in headlamps.

His voice a little softer, he tried a more detailed instruction: "I want to see you running your hands all over your body."

Hugo was no expert on female masturbation, but he did have his recent experiences watching Madeleine pleasing herself to draw from. He cast his mind back, tried to remember how she'd done it, from start to finish.

"Start at your shoulders and stroke down your chest," he said gently.

She offered him a warm, sexy smile, but turned her back to the windows, shielding herself from potential onlookers as she began to comply. Nevertheless her compliance gave Hugo a little tickle of pleasure. She was doing what he told her to. There was something delicious in that.

"Now down your stomach, and over your thighs..."

He could hear the quiet whisper of her hands sweeping down over her smooth skin as she fulfilled her instructions, her hands so graceful skirting over her curves, drawing his gaze with them as they flaunted her body for him.

"You look so beautiful, honey," Hugo said, almost moaning.

"You're making me so hard already."

That comment provoked a smile, and he even thought he caught the mischievous flicker of lust pass through his young wife's face, her eyes slipping across to where he sat to see if she could detect this physical manifestation of his desire for her.

Her movements grew in confidence, her caresses becoming somehow more natural, fluid, graceful. More like how she'd been before, when she had no idea he was watching her.

“Take off your bra, Maddie. Show me your beautiful breasts.”

Her eyes widened for a moment at this sudden command from her husband, and she glanced across at him, mouth opening in mild shock as if she was about to raise objection considering the open state of the blinds. But then she seemed to reconsider—she wanted to do everything she was told.

She slipped the thin black straps over her shoulder, then reached behind her back to flip the catch.

Hugo felt the oxygen levels reducing as he watched her lean back against the glass, her full breasts so prominent on her chest now, so very bare, her nipples pointing up hard as bullets. Could anyone across the street see her? They had to know what she was doing, even able to see only her back.

“You’re so incredible, sweetie,” he sighed, though forcing himself to be loud enough for her to hear, and respond with the kind of brightness that demonstrated her growing confidence. “Feel those beautiful breasts of yours, squeeze your nipples.”

Now her hands were moving up to push her breasts together, her head turning to check herself out as she fondled her soft flesh, fingers nudging up against her stiff little buds, exploring their sensitivity, coaxing that glorious tingling energy out to ripple through her entire body.

She moaned at the feelings washing over her, and Hugo could see her hips fidgeting a little, as though the physical contact with her breasts was stirring electricity between her thighs, her erogenous zones connected by direct pathways that mean stimulation of her hard little nipples resulted in sensations within her pussy.

Then she was looking across at him, seeking further instructions, her expression almost pleading with him to allow her to touch herself between her thighs.

“So how long have you really been doing this while watching people across the street?” Hugo asked her.

“Weeks and weeks,” she said, brushing her hair out of her face briefly as she continued cupping and caressing her breasts. It amused him that she’d been shy about telling him the truth before.

“You kept that to yourself.”

“Well it wasn’t proper for a young lady.”

“I guess not. Young ladies get curious though. Is it just your crush who gets... frisky... while you watch?”

She shook her head. “There’s a young couple up from the students, who sometimes forget to close the curtains. Not very often, though. And the college guys.”

“They do more than just party?”

“They have a lot of girls round there.”

“Your pussy needs some attention, honey,” Hugo said, feeling so odd to be using such words with her, let alone going against his nature to act dominant with her. Yet she seemed to respond to it, she wasn’t laughing at him any more.

One of his own hands now drifted down to his crotch in tandem with Madeleine’s hand now slipping over her stomach to nestle between her thighs. Watching her cup her mound, then one finger rise to trace the hot, wet topography of her underlying pussy through the thin purple fabric of her panties, Hugo felt himself fully hard again—explosively hard.

“Can you see?” she asked, now looking over at him again with a more seductive look that showed her swelling self-consciousness.

“Of course,” he said. “I’m so hard watching you, honey.” He now unfastened his fly, releasing his manhood before her gaze, though his raised knee concealed it from the outside world.

A slight gasp and a bright beaming grin at hearing that, he saw her finger subtly slip under the purple lace of her panties, seeking out her hot little honeypot unrestricted.

“Do you like me watching?”

She paused briefly, but then nodded. “Yes,” she said softly.

“Has anyone from over there ever seen you?”

“No,” she said, certain as certain could be. “I keep the blinds virtually closed.”

He watched her body gently writhing and undulating with the steady, deep rhythm of her breathing as she now touched herself, uttering the kind of sensuous sighs that sent shudders through his whole body.

What an incredible sight she was—all that bare flesh, smooth skin, almost glowing as the sexual energy swept through her system. Her graceful curves taking his breath away every moment that she moved.

“Take off your panties, honey,” he growled now. “Let me see how wet you are.”

She gave him a little gasp and a playful look of mock-outrage, making him chuckle a little. But she did as she was told—hands landing on her hips, thumbs twisting under the waistband of her underwear, then as she lifted her butt, she pulled the scrap of purple over her thighs, down her legs and away.

He saw the little puff of soft hair on her mound, then she angled herself a little on the window seat, lifting the knee closest to him, and she was showing him everything—the scandalous pink petals of her pussy, glistening from her personal moisture.

Her glance in his direction now was dazzling hot and daring him to object. She didn’t need instructions to return her fingers to those slippery folds between her thighs, dancing around her clit, sliding between her lips.

“I never would have taken you for the voyeur type,” he said.

“Touché,” she said, that outer leg slipping down so that anyone watching her could have no illusions that what she was doing was in any way innocent. “I wasn’t to start with.”

Hugo found it both shocking and immensely thrilling to see her exhibitionist streak now beginning to emerge, his wife growing in confidence as she grew comfortable with the situation and the realization of her fantasy.

“You like watching the college students? I know you like watching your crush over there.”

“To start with I was a little horrified at what they were doing—and how public it all was,” she said. “But I guess I got curious. It was interesting. Different to what we’re used to.”

He felt his pulse racing as he watched her slide her fingers inside herself, and then on withdrawing them again, trace them up over her soft skin to spread her moisture even to her sensitive nipples.

“Interesting?” he prompted.

“It was different from us, from the way we did it,” she said.

“Different from the way things were in college in our day.”

“We’re not that old!”

“We didn’t grow up with Facebook charting our every life moment.”

Hugo felt a little funny when she mentioned college, alluded to the fact she was having sex in college. He hadn’t known her back then—they’d met a few years after college. And even after so many years together, married for five, they had never discussed their sexual pasts. The potential for jealousy had left that subject off limits. Yet Hugo now found himself curious of what had come before him for his wife. What her experiences had been.

Perhaps he was now interested in finding out about her sexual past—it might even be a thrill to hear of her sexual coming of age, of the exciting times she’d had before.

Prodding a little, he said: “How d’you mean? How are they different to what happened in college?”

With one hand, she was stroking around her pussy, massaging her outer labia, almost teasing herself. Sitting there opposite him like that, Hugo couldn’t remember a time when her sex had been quite so explicitly exposed to him. She was stunningly beautiful, and the practiced, flowing movement of her hands over her flesh was quite breathtaking, almost hypnotic for Hugo.

She pressed her fingers either side of her slit, coaxing herself, her pink inner lips glistening a little with her dew, her middle fingers only occasionally dipping into her pussy itself.

Turning to gaze out of the window again, she said: “When they get going... the guys are always going down on the girls.”

“You like that they do?”

“I think so. I guess I should ask you more.”

“You should.”

Madeleine even blushed again, making him wonder if the modern student attitude to oral sex had somehow affected her more than she thought possible.

Hugo certainly enjoyed oral sex, and as Madeleine had emerged recently with her newly sensuous, sexy confidence, the thought of going down on her seemed to be ever more often on his mind. The previous night, he’d been surprised at how she had seemed to accept it, embrace it, rather than encouraging him to move on to the penetration, the “full” sex, as she might have in the old days.

Hugo turned to see the apartment across the way had changed in form—the lights were now low, which gave a whole different look to the place, made it seem somehow smaller, more intimate. The partygoers were drinking and chatting, while others were smoking in what seemed wrong for an indoor location. Hugo wondered what Madeleine had seen over there.

“They have a different attitude toward sex than we did, I think,” Madeleine said. “More open, more... expressive.”

Her fingers seemed to be taking on a life of their own, circling her sex and penetrating it, slowly, but building in intensity. It was as though the rest of her body was merely along for the ride, her chest slowly undulating as her breathing deepened in response to her manipulation.

“Expressive?”

She gasped suddenly, tilting her head back for a moment to suck in a sudden lungful of oxygen. Then she regained control, flashing him a mischievous grin by way of apology for interrupting their conversation.

She said: “I don’t know... it’s hard to explain. They’re just more confident, more passionate...”

“See,” she whispered, and they both looked across the street to see one of the bedrooms in the students’ apartment was now occupied by more than just coats. A male student was lying on his back, a pretty redhead sitting astride him, her skirt hiked up so he could access her. She wasn’t sitting astride his crotch, either—quite the other end.

Hugo felt a hint of envy, but that feeling quickly turned into desire, a craving to be performing the same kind of thing for his pretty wife.

“You like that?” he asked her. “That they do this kind of thing so much?”

She looked at him, appearing to silently debate the question in her own head. Then she nodded. “I think it’s nice. I guess... I guess I never thought people did that because they wanted to. But those guys over there really do seem to want to. It’s not just to please their partners.”

He said: “I guess the younger generations are more in tune with sexual equality, even than ours.”

“Maybe.”

Hugo heard Madeleine quietly moan now as she watched this couple across the way, the young red-haired woman casually sitting there astride her companion’s face, grinding her hips over him. He realized he could hear the wet sounds of her fingers slipping inside her. Was she imagining being that redhead?

A trifle unexpectedly, Hugo started feeling disappointed that Madeleine's crush wasn't currently over there. He was curious, about how she would respond to see him again while in the company of her husband.

"I don't understand why you're not angry about it," she said.

"Why should I be angry?"

"When we were first dating you couldn't stand the idea of me even looking at another guy."

"When we were first dating there was every chance you'd want to stop dating me. We're married now."

Hugo heard her catch her breath, and felt himself tremble a little, his heart rate picking up. Madeleine's crush was back from dinner,

"He's there. I see him."

TWO

His stomach was swamped with heat, jealousy, arousal, bursting forth inside him like a perfect storm. His eyes darted from window to window in that apartment across the street, looking for signs of the man who had drawn Madeleine's attention.

"Over there by the front door," she whispered, almost in awe.

Hugo looked, and sure enough there was the tall, athletic-looking guy who so infuriated and antagonized Madeleine while he was stalking her in the bookstore, and yet made her secretly melt inside.

Something about him intimidated Hugo—the sheer physicality of the guy, perhaps. He must have worked out regularly, even concealed by clothes, it was clear he had a powerful physique. Yet Hugo's intimidation wasn't purely from his size, his apparent strength. The guy seemed tuned to stir Madeleine's lust, his stylish clothes and wildly overlong hair lending him a kind of Byronesque romanticism that made bookish girls like her weak at the knees. The quiet affluence of his understated and yet unmistakable designer clothes, apartment, mannerisms all attested to the kind of man who had to represent the ultimate danger to a husband whose wife he sought.

A husband ought to be provoked into a furious rage knowing his wife even spoke to such a man. And yet Hugo felt a curious adrenaline fire within him, that Madeleine was not just talking, flirting with the man on a daily basis, but that she actively harbored a genuine schoolgirl crush on him. It felt to Hugo as though he was tightrope walking to let this happen.

The man was dangerous, and Hugo could see it now in the way that his wife seemed to glow to look upon him. She was so beautiful in her quiet longing for this other man—yet she also seemed a touch giddy about it, gawky, awkward in a cute kind of way.

“He looks like one of those guys from that vampire show you like.”

“I guess, a little.”

He looked back toward Madeleine, and was startled to see her on her feet and right next to him, that sexy glow about her turning almost feverish as she smiled suggestively. She turned to present her shapely rear to him, and then nudged his nearest leg aside so that she could plant her behind down between his thighs, sitting on the window seat in front of him.

“Touch me,” she said, almost whispered.

She wriggled back so she was lying back against his body, turning her gaze to the window and her crush across the street. Resting back against his shoulder, tilting her head so he could lean in and kiss her mouth.

Her breath was hot even before he connected with her, but as he kissed her, he could see how deeply she was breathing from the rise and fall of her chest, he could see how stiff her nipples were poking out from her breasts.

She was really on fire.

He reached around, cupping her breasts, scoping out those hardened little buds and the way her cleavage just seemed to perk up at the thought that her crush was just across the street, and her husband was now with her, touching her as she watched him.

Hugo felt her grab one of his hands now, guiding it down her smooth stomach and over the soft fuzz covering her mound.

As his fingers closed over her hot, tender folds, he found her already seriously wet.

She let out a long moan as he began to play with her.

“So he’s the one, huh?” he asked her, his hardness pressing against her as she sat lodged between his legs. “He seems like quite a specimen.”

Quietly sighing, gasping, she leaned back again, tilting her head to kiss his cheek.

“And you’re really okay for me to... watch him?” she asked, and he saw her fingers now swarming over his, her hand enclosing his between her thighs, and she was moving him, showing him where to touch, sharing the rhythm that got her off.

“I guess it’s a little hard to understand,” he said. “I guess I like the idea of watching you pleasure yourself as though I’m not here to affect things.”

“But thinking about me being with him?”

“Maybe. We’re married, we’ve been together for years, you’d be different with another guy, I think. I’d be curious.”

Breathing hard, she was tilting her hips now, this way and that, fucking his fingers as he penetrated her.

“But you’re not jealous at all, me watching another man, thinking about him? Isn’t it just plain wrong?”

He felt his hardness throbbing as it pressed against her lower back while she said those words, and he did actually feel the jealousy swirling around his belly—but also felt strong enough to control it, ride it like a surfer rides a wave.

“Sure, I’m jealous,” he conceded. “Nervous, scared, I guess. But even that adds to the thrill—it’s scared like on a roller coaster.”

“Scared of what?”

“I guess scared that you’d prefer the other man.”

“You know I’d never do that.”

“And that’s why I can handle you having a crush. I have a safety net.”

“A safety net.”

“I trust you.”

He brought his fingers up to his face, smelled the strong odor of her sex on them, then slipped them inside his mouth to sample her tangy flavor.

Across the street, the student apartment seemed emptier now, most of those remaining behind engaging in either drunken dancing or amorous embraces.

Down a floor, Hugo's eye was drawn to that bedroom again—and he was not disappointed. The lights went on, and they saw The Crush head inside. Hugo heard his wife catch her breath as they watched him strip off his shirt, and the t-shirt underneath, to reveal an impressive frame that suggested he worked out, quite a lot, too. Abs, pecs, biceps to die for, or maybe to end marriages over.

“He must work out. You ever see him in your gym?”

“Hmm. Naughty girl.”

Then off came the Crush's pants, leaving him in merely a pair of black boxer shorts. Probably silk, judging by the rest of his appearance, though they could not tell from that distance. He crouched, and then stretched out on the floor of his room, apparently to do press-ups.

Hugo simultaneously coaxed Madeleine's left breast and her pussy, both hands working to further her pleasure. There was an urgency in the movement of her hips, in her panting—but he didn't want her to come yet.

She was unbelievably wet as he touched her, as she watched the tall dark stranger in just his underwear, stretching his muscular body in various positions as though warming up prior to a gym workout. He was certainly fit, certainly athletic. It made Hugo feel instantly more jealous, yet at the same time pleased that Madeleine did not just have a crush on any old guy.

And it was strangely exciting to know she must fantasize about that strong, beautiful body pressed against hers, her hands running all over his bulging muscles, wanting him to take her in some athletic, animalistic way.

That dark little place inside Hugo was curious to see Madeleine making love to such a body. Well, it was safe enough to fantasize.

“Watch him,” he said to her, as if he needed to ask, but at that she turned to kiss her husband on the mouth again, her right hand slipping behind his head, pulling his neck so he was compelled to tangle with her. She was tasting him, the slight lingering hint of her own juices on his lips and tongue, her eyes sparkling with the reaction to this strange compulsion in him for her to watch this guy she’d confessed to finding attractive.

“You’re crazy, you know that?” she said, a trifle breathless.

“Crazy about you, honey,” he grinned. “It’s so hot he’s got you all goose bumps and blushes.”

“You’re serious, you want me to watch him?”

“I’m serious.”

They watched the Crush doing his perfect press-ups, as though some unseen drill instructor was barking instructions from afar. Those muscles really working, flexing, pumping, as his board-like torso rose and fell. Could Madeleine imagine herself under him?

“What do you think about when you watch him?” he asked her softly, his mouth so close to her ear.

Her hand was pressing his up around her clit, where she was encouraging him to massage around her little button more than on it directly. But he kept slipping his fingers inside her when he could, if anything to wonder at just how wet she was while they watched this bronzed Adonis in his late-night warm-down.

She paused, not really comfortable fully opening up, perhaps. She said quietly: “I’m not sure I’m really thinking all that much when I watch him.”

He could tell she was worried about saying something that would hurt her husband. It was against everything normal in society for a wife to acknowledge her eyes were wandering to another man, even if her husband seemed supportive of the idea.

“You imagine being with him?”

“Possibly...”

“Running your hands all over his powerful body.”

She moaned, and wiggled her hips as though to explain away her moan as merely a response to his touching her, rather than her husband being suggestive about her fantasizing about a hunk across the street.

“Feeling his strong arms around you...”

“Oh... you’re a bad man, Hugo,” she groaned. “Wicked.”

“Maybe you feel something big and hard pressing against you as he pulls you against him...”

She was so wet, wetter than he remembered her ever being before.

He urged her up, and she didn’t quite understand what he wanted. Was he going to fuck her now? Guide her onto his hard cock? He held firmly onto her thighs, encouraging her up in a crouch, but preventing her from standing up the whole way, or jumping off the window seat.

He slid down, his body moving under hers, between her legs, but not stopping to allow her to sit on his prominent erection as it strained against his pants.

And then he was lying on the window seat on his back, staring up at her exposed pussy, pulling gently on her thighs to urge her back down, so that she could lay her sex over his mouth.

“What are you doing?” she asked him.

“Seriously?”

“Seriously.”

“Okay,” she said hesitantly. “But I want to see you as well. Take off your pants.”

He did as he asked, unbuckling his belt, yanking down his pants and underwear to reveal his hard cock to her gaze, which confirmed that he was enjoying himself as she watched her crush.

It seemed to make her relax. She sank down, allowed her searingly hot, dripping pussy to touch down against his mouth. She leaned forward, and it was awkward getting a good position to lap at her slick folds, but he found it, hands reaching up to grab her beautifully round behind, pull her down onto his eager tongue.

He felt her hands taking hold of his hardness, knew what she was doing, allowed her a brief taste of his cock. But then he broke off from her.

“I want you to watch him,” Hugo said. He felt her sit up, pumping him a few times before letting his erection go.

She lifted herself off him—unsure of this position, not to mention his request for her to look at another man, her crush, as she sat astride her husband’s face.

“You’re really serious?” she said, not for the first time. She shifted back, so she could see his eyes between her thighs, see that he meant what he was saying.

“I’m serious. Forget it’s me down here, if you like, forget it’s your husband.”

There was horror in her eyes, but also confused excitement. He could imagine a rush of questions were whirling around her head, similar questions to those whirling around his.

“You do remember I told you this guy hangs out at the bookstore sometimes?”

“I remember.”

“And my gym. That doesn’t make you jealous? You still want me to watch him?”

“I don’t know why,” he said, “but it’s hot. It’s forbidden, I guess, it’s risky. But I want you to feel unrestrained, liberated.”

She brushed her pussy over his mouth, giving him a little taste of her wetness, teasing him, in a manner that made Hugo wonder if she’d seen the gesture performed by a college student in that apartment over there.

“If you were watching a girl across the street, and I found out you had a crush on her, there’s no way in hell I’d let you look at her,” she said.

“I know,” he said.

“Just so you know. If you had a crush on a girl across the street, we’d be moving apartments.”

“I have a crush on you, that’s all I need,” he said, and she rewarded him with another taste of her sex, moving her hips slightly to stroke her soft folds over his face.

He hummed in pleasure as he tasted her tangy flavor.

“You’re crazy, you know that?”

She wiggled as she lodged his head against her pussy again, her hands touching gently against his chin as he began feasting on her. Then she was gyrating her hips to graze her wetness over his face, and he loved it, loved that she was in such an intimate connection with him.

He could worship her, even while she was imagining her own pure pleasure in the hands of another acolyte.

She remained silent, though, she felt uncomfortable providing her husband a commentary.

He broke off briefly, pushed down his head to free up some space in which to speak. “What’s he doing?” he asked. “Tell me what he’s doing.”

“He’s stretching,” she said. “Yoga, I guess. He usually does it before bed.”

“You like watching him doing yoga?”

“I like it when he’s wearing almost nothing, and he’s showing off his gorgeous body in front of the windows, sure,” she said, almost teasing him except that it was exactly what he wanted to hear.

She leaned forward again, and now he felt her take one of his hands, his right hand, and place it over his hardness. She wanted to watch him, just as he had watched her earlier. He did as she wanted, gripping himself, starting up a slow motion on his shaft, being careful not to go over the top and lose it.

It was a thrill to be in a position they'd never tried before, to be servicing her while she looked across at her crush, imagining that stranger between her thighs.

He couldn't really see what she was doing from down there underneath her, but he could picture her watching, fantasizing as he indulged in the taste and scent and heat of her pussy.

Madeleine could not hold back. She surprised him by suddenly crying out, shuddering over him as he ate her, her come so profuse, her flavor saturating his immediate world.

Her orgasm was unmistakable—and it pushed him into an explosive climax of his own.

Afterwards, as they disentangled, Hugo saw that the light in the room that apparently belonged to her crush had been extinguished.

Three

Saturday, lunch was in Brooklyn, with Lucy and her mother, who were in town to look for an apartment, since Lucy was aiming to go back to school to pursue a doctorate.

“You can’t go anywhere in policy circles without a doctorate,” she’d explained, alluding to her attempt to move from the declining world of journalism into a career in policy, which seemed to Hugo more worthy than his move into PR—if she could make the finances work out.

Madeleine was in top form, ecstatic that her best friend was coming to live in New York.

Lucy’s change in life direction had not only been taken because of the latest purges at the Globe: she’d recently split from her long-term boyfriend, which had also made it attractive to her to make a fresh start in a new city.

It also meant she was in a mood to complain about men.

“He just got so angry all the time,” she said over a chicken pesto salad, “I should never have let it go on so long.”

“Well you did the right thing,” Madeleine’s role was simply to be supportive, of course.

“I said you could do better,” said Lucy’s Mom, a small woman who gave Lucy the Asian part of her mixed heritage, and now seemed to disapprove of all men, flashing Hugo the occasional dark look as though disappointing women was innate to all mankind.

Hugo kept quiet, kept his head down.

But at some of the complaints that strayed close to being targeted at men generally, Madeleine would secretly cast a mischievous look toward her husband, or quietly raise an eyebrow, or even chance a quick eye-roll, letting Hugo know she thought he was perfect, despite everything Lucy was saying about his gender.

“He was so immature,” Lucy said, “If we went to a party or a dinner or something together, and I even looked at someone else—far less talked to another guy—he got so mad.”

“It’s weird he’d be so insecure after all the time you’d been together,” Madeleine said. “He probably knew he was losing you ‘cause he was being such a jerk.”

Lucy nodded. “One time we were at this gallery opening down on Peyton, and our arts editor kissed me on both cheeks—which he does to anyone, by the way, men and women. And he’s so obviously gay. Greg went nuts.”

“He is butch gay, though, not camp gay,” Madeleine said, playing devil’s advocate for a moment.

“What. Ever.”

Madeleine skewered a shrimp, and said innocently: “I don’t think Hugo would get jealous even if another man kissed me.”

She flashed her husband a wickedly suggestive look that quite clearly alluded to their recent bedroom discussions.

Hugo smiled back at her, but did actually feel a slight tickle of jealousy at what Madeleine was hinting at—along with a stronger tingle inside his body and between his thighs at the thought of what his wife was picturing.

Lucy, who seemed mildly surprised that Hugo and Madeleine were still tight after everything that had happened that night, said: “God, you two are so great together.”

“Hugo knows he’s the only one for me, so I don’t think anything could faze him like that,” Madeleine said. “I’m sure I could flirt and chat with other guys all night, and he’d always know he was the only one for me—wouldn’t you sweetie?”

Hugo raised his own eyebrow, wondering what she was doing, but said: “Of course, honey.”

Was she trying to make him jealous? Was she trying to get back at him for prying into her masturbatory fantasies? Forcing her to hint that sometimes she thought about other men while touching herself, particularly the guy across the street.

“I need to get married,” Lucy sniffed. “To someone who’s not going to go nuts if I’m in the same room as a hot guy.”

“Not to somebody like Greg,” her mother murmured.

Madeleine said, “Sometimes it’s kinda nice having your guy getting a little jealous. You know—that he wants you so much for himself.”

“I guess... to a certain extent,” Lucy said.

Madeleine cast her husband an impish smile, said: “I remember one time we were on vacation in Rio, the two of us were standing at a bar by the beach, this guy was hitting on me while Hugo was trying to order margaritas.”

Hugo felt a burst of heat inside his chest, remembering the occasion well. It had probably been six or seven months into their relationship, Madeleine had been wearing a bikini in the hope of getting some color into her pale skin, and she had looked incredible—drawing stares from all male eyes anywhere near their vicinity. She’d given up wearing bikinis soon after that.

Madeleine said, “He was this Brazilian guy—gorgeous body, permanent tan, Rolex watch—and so charming. But he had an enormous hard-on while he stood there trying to ask me out—you could see it through his trunks.”

“Eeeewww,” Lucy said.

Madeleine bobbed her eyebrows at Hugo suggestively at the memory of her Brazilian encounter.

Hugo remembered how angry he’d been at the time, although he had managed to keep his cool, merely telling the guy she was with him, to go find some other American girl to charm. Madeleine had merely giggled, making him feel she was testing him, though clearly enjoying the attention from the Brazilian with the Rolex.

“Hugo was just about ready to call in the army back then,” Madeleine sniggered. “I think it was fun having boys fighting over me.”

Hugo felt himself blushing, and perhaps even a little afraid his wife was now going to blurt out his secret fantasy to her friend and her friend’s mother, although he was pretty sure Lucy was going to learn the full details soon enough. Madeleine told her everything.

But he also now thought about that little scene at that beach bar in Rio with a new attitude. It was actually hot to think of the interest Madeleine had attracted from other men, how they had lusted after her—quite blatantly on many occasions—and yet she was only with Hugo. Madeleine was beautiful then as she was now, but she was with him.

And dark little thoughts now made Hugo feel his own manhood thickening between his thighs. What if Madeleine had been single—would she have gone off with that Brazilian guy with the flashy wristwatch?

Lucy said, “Yeah, but after a while it’s a pain. You just wish they’d stop being so God-damn immature.”

“Hey,” Lucy’s mother chided her daughter’s blasphemy. “Burning fires of hell. Waiting for you.”

“If you’re with the right person, there’s the kind of trust that means none of that matters,” Madeleine said, giving Hugo the sense that she was mulling over these thoughts, considering what their recent discussions really meant. “You know he can sit on the couch watching Baywatch...”

Lucy gave a longing sigh in response, and even cast Hugo an admiring glance.

“It’s not on any more,” Hugo said a trifle defensively.

“...ogling at all the pretty girls in swimsuits, and you can just let him have his fun, because at the end of the day you know he loves you, not them.”

Another sigh from Lucy.

“And I can point out a cute guy on the street, or wear a bikini on the beach, or go out for dinner with a hunky friend, and he knows I’m only his.”

Hugo found himself twitching in his pants at her less than subtle suggestion that some guy might ask her out for dinner.

Lucy’s mother excused herself to the bathroom, and Madeleine said to her friend, “You know, I think Hugo even enjoys it when other guys flirt with me now. Guess it makes him think he married the right girl.”

Lucy and Madeleine laughed as Hugo protested, but through it all Madeleine gave him a very personal, penetrating gaze that made it clear she knew she was on to something—and Hugo felt his insides catching fire with the sense that she was not even a little bit wrong.

“So you guys... You sorted out what happened with Fabian?” Lucy said in a loud whisper, able finally to get her burning question in, now that her mother had left them.

“We did,” Madeleine said, her eyes blazing as she teased her husband. “Hugo says he doesn’t have a problem with it.”

Lucy giggled and egged on her friend, saying: “Seriously? Even though he’s the hottest guy in books?”

Madeleine chuckled, “He is a bit of a dreamboat...”

Hugo smiled beneficently on their attempt to provoke his jealousy, but for some reason, the way his wife spoke like a swooning schoolgirl did tickle his fancy.

Lucy groaned and said: “I bet Hugo is horribly jealous really—just doesn’t want to show it.”

Madeleine shrugged. “I don’t know... maybe, maybe not. Maybe he wouldn’t have even batted an eyelid if I’d shared a cab home with Fabian.”

Hugo felt the hairs on the back of his neck rise, the dark tendrils of jealousy snaking around his heart. And yet, for some bizarre reason, he found it thrilling, his blood flowing more quickly around his body, his loins fizzing at the thought of his wife taking someone home. What would he do if that happened?

“I thought you were more interested in the guy from across the street,” he said coolly.

“Oh, he’s gorgeous as well,” Madeleine teased, twirling a strand of hair with a couple of fingers, gently biting her lip, pretending at some kind of nervous teenage lust. “I’m surrounded, huh?”

“Maybe he doesn’t swing your way,” Hugo suggested.

Madeleine chuckled, “Oh, Connor is all into the ladies.”

Connor. So that was his name.

“Maybe he’s got a small dick.”

“Oh, I know that’s not true.”

Hugo felt his pulse quicken, his fullness beneath the belt was making it uncomfortable to sit as he was in those jeans.

They saw Lucy’s mom heading back towards the table, and shared a look that said: not now. Later. Hugo felt as though his insides were on fire.

Lucy looked at them both with unabashed envy at the sizzling chemistry between them, and said: “God, sometimes I do wish I was married. I know what you two’re gonna do when you get home.”

Four

Lucy was right, of course, although they had to get through a leisurely post-lunch coffee first, with Lucy's mother feeling no need to rush.

On the subway home, Madeleine gave Hugo the kind of semi-amused look that said clearly she was feeling frisky after their lunch discussion, and she wasn't going to let it go. The train carriage was almost empty, though not so empty that people couldn't see them—so Hugo tried to dampen his own feelings.

They were both standing up, despite there being plenty of seats available. It was as though sitting would somehow spoil the energy now running through them both.

Holding onto a handrail to steady himself against the rocking motion of the subway train, as Madeleine held on to him, her sweet cherry-vanilla perfume dominating his every breath, Hugo was finding it difficult to maintain his restraint.

Madeleine wasn't making it easy. She leaned up to whisper in his ear: "That guy over there keeps checking me out."

She stepped back to register his reaction to her revelation, a mischievous expression on her pretty face as she tried to read him. Madeleine allowed her coat to fall open a little, and he could see a hint of her hard nipples even though her layers of clothing.

She was teasing him, trying to provoke him after he'd been so calm about her acknowledged flirting with Fabian and Connor.

But he remained calm, saying only: "Is that right?"

She was fooling around with her long dirty blonde ponytail, as though being coy. He could see her steeling glances down the carriage, and tried to fend off his own curiosity to avoid overtly gazing at the object of her claims.

Madeleine leaned into him again, tilting her head up to breathe into his ear again: “He’s so obvious.”

There was that faint tinge of pink in her cheeks that so clearly suggested her arousal that it made Hugo feel a little light-headed.

He gave into the curiosity, made it appear as if he were trying to look outside, to work out where they were in relation to their destination, to conceal his glance down the carriage.

Sure enough, there was a guy sitting halfway down the carriage who was, from time to time, quite blatantly gazing down the train in Madeleine’s direction. A little younger than them, Hugo would have said—maybe even as young as 21, 22. Clean-cut, slightly preppy dress sense. A college guy out without his frat buddies. Could have been one of the guys in the apartment across their street.

Hugo felt his pulse quicken a little as he turned away, keeping the guy just about in focus at the corner of his eye, as the guy quite clearly looked Madeleine up and down.

Madeleine seemed to give him a slight pose, allowing her coat to open again so he could check out her figure, her top riding up to offer the tantalizing glimpse of flesh, her feet pushing herself up onto her tiptoes to show off her shapely legs as bound in skin-tight jeans.

He leaned in to his wife’s ear now, whispering: “You’re such a dirty girl.”

Hugo paused a moment before disengaging, inhaling her scent, enthralled by her. For a beat, he wondered just how he had ever won her affections. She was the kind of pretty girl he’d seen on the subway when he was a student here, and had lusted after from afar, accepting he would never walk someone like this home.

But this beauty he had married.

Hugo felt a sudden craving to collapse to his knees and worship her—perhaps bury his face between her thighs, and bring her to orgasm with his mouth.

Yet she was cautiously looking down the carriage at another man.

Madeleine grinned as she saw her husband looking subtly down at his young rival.

“Isn’t he sweet?” she whispered. “We should take him home.”

Her eyes blazed, but Hugo felt himself struggling for breath, a jolt of surprise shooting through his insides, even as his loins stirred with warmth.

She could see his reaction to her suggestion, and silently smiled at her own success. Hugo tried to downplay his emotions, temper his response to her provocation.

Trying to beat him, push him into jealousy, she whispered into his ear: “I bet he has a heavenly cock.”

But while Hugo felt a dark flutter of jealousy inside, he was beginning to associate that feeling with the warm fizzing of serious arousal and the unbridled hardness of his manhood that went with it. Jealousy—however softened it had become from his years of a trusting relationship with Madeleine—was becoming a thrill. It seemed to pierce the easy routine of their coupling, light the fire under them.

“He can’t take his eyes off you,” Hugo whispered into her ear, adding: “I’m not surprised.”

“Kiss me,” she replied. “Claim me.”

She pressed herself up against him, quietly gasping as she felt his hardness through his pants. Inhaling her sweet scent with every breath, he drew her lips to him, hand gently but firmly supporting the back of her head. He felt her melt as his mouth connected with hers, felt her tremble as he tenderly teased her with his tongue, sucked a little on her bottom lip.

“Now he’s jealous,” she grinned as they finally pulled apart.

“Envious,” Hugo corrected her. “Jealous is what I feel when I hear you talking about his cock. Envy is what he feels seeing I have such a hot babe for a wife, wishing he could march up here and just take you away from me.”

He kissed her again, and this time his hand was opening her coat, finding its way to her breast, his fingers closing around her flesh, fingers finding her stiff nipple through her blouse.

And the college guy down the end of the carriage could see all of it.

Hugo could feel his wife shiver at the thrill—and somehow he felt a kind of echo of that shiver himself, from the clear realization: she was getting off on showing, on teasing this guy, on being the center of attention for two horny men.

The train slowed for the next stop, and Hugo pulled back, one hand moving to the nearest hand rail, the other falling by his side, withdrawing from Madeleine in case people got on at the next stop who might pass judgment, disapprove of this PDA.

Madeleine looked at him with an expression that was part disapproval, part amusement, and the remainder pure arousal. She nodded at him as though pointing out that the fact he had felt the need to disengage because they were stopping at a station was clear evidence that what he was doing to her was out of line.

But she was so obviously getting off on this. It was so thrilling to watch, Hugo thought.

A few people stepped off the train, but as they waited, no one new entered the carriage. Doors closed, and they were easing away from the platform again. Other than the college guy, there was an old couple that wasn't even facing them, and that was about it for their carriage.

Hugo and Madeleine stepped together again, and this time she slipped her coat off her shoulder and pushed out her chest as though demanding his hands. Showing off for her audience, she moaned as Hugo placed his hand against her flesh, squeezed her.

He leaned into her, his mouth close to her ear to whisper: “I think you're right.”

One of her eyebrows bobbed upward.

“I think you’re right he has a big cock. I think you’re making it rock hard, and it’s huge...”

Madeleine blushed furiously, and as if to distract from it, poked him sharply in the stomach. “You’re just being ridiculous.”

“Look.”

He kissed her again, this time a little more theatrically, whirling her around so that she could see over his shoulder as they kissed. Perhaps see the monster she had created in the chinos of the young man at the other end of the carriage.

Madeleine squealed as she felt her husband’s hand now snaking up underneath her top, creeping toward her cleavage. Her squeal made the college guy sit up and almost completely give the game away that he was watching every move the couple was making.

He whispered: “How does it feel making two guys hard at once?”

She glanced down towards the other man, a little awkwardly as Hugo slipped his finger under the top of her bra, to touch the velvet stiffness of her nipple. College guy was doing his utmost to avoid looking, but every once in a while they caught a flick of his eyes.

Hugo turned her so she could watch over his shoulder, and his hand now dropped out of her top, his fingers wandering over her belt and down past her fly to seek out the heat between her thighs.

She gasped. “Hey,” she whispered sharply, but did not stop him from nestling his hand between her legs. Even through the thick denim fabric, he could feel the intense heat, and perhaps did not merely imagine a hint of dampness there.

She breathed: “I’m going to have to change my underwear when we get home.”

He smiled, said: “You should have worn a skirt. Could have shown him how wet he’s making you.”

“How wet you’re making me.”

Madeleine looked him in the eyes, analyzing him again, scrutinizing his own face, his eyes, for any sign that he was setting a trap for her, that he was actually displeased with her reaction to the situation.

Then she gave a slight affirmative nod of the head.

“I should get off at the next stop,” he teased. “Leave you to it. I could get the next train.”

That made her giggle, but he saw her squirm a little, thighs rubbing together, and knew she was tingling at the thought of chatting up the young man free from the oversight of her husband.

“We’re almost at our stop,” she said dismissively.

“You should stop teasing, or a girl could end up thinking you’re serious,” she said with a wry grin, but her hand now pressed longingly at his crotch, taking in the shape of his erect cock, wanting it for herself.

He whispered: “I’m always serious,” but smiled at her, so she wasn’t entirely sure whether he was or wasn’t. To be honest, he wasn’t certain himself.

The train slowed, and sure enough it was their stop. Madeleine virtually dragged her husband from the carriage, hissing through clenched teeth that people would soon start thinking she had bladder control problems if they didn’t get home.

As they descended the stairs, pushed through the turnstyle and stepped onto the darkening street, she asked him: “When did you turn into such a complete pervert, Hugo Finnell?”

He shrugged, said: “Probably about the time you realized you’re an exhibitionist, Madeleine Finnell.”

Five

Inside the front door, they were kissing, Madeleine dropping her bag without a care where it fell, pulling her husband to her, sucking his lips in between hers.

Hugo felt his hot jealousy from Madeleine's eyeing up strangers on the train translate into raw passion, driven on by the thought of just how wet she was inside her jeans from fooling around in front of the innocent college guy.

Inside apartment just feet from the front door, his hands were feverishly pulling apart his wife's coat, slipping it off her shoulders, sliding under her top to find her heaving breasts.

"Hey," she said, her mouth curling into a smile. "Don't you wanna watch first?"

"Oh, please," he moaned, not entirely understanding what she was offering him.

She nodded, and he could tell she was concealing her own excitement. "Get in there," she said in a conspiratorial tone, nodding to the bedroom.

Inside, he decided on a position on the window seat, rather than on the bed, from where he could see her but not touch her, at least initially. Maybe he just wanted to give her the space to display herself for him on the bed, without interruption. Maybe he wanted to see what the view might be for somebody watching from across the street.

When she entered the bedroom, Madeleine was looking stunning. She'd removed her jeans, and now wore merely a white tank top and pink and white cotton panties.

Making herself comfortable on the bed, he could see her face flushed pink, see her chest rising and falling with her deep breathing. She slipped her sandy hair tidily back over shoulders, and now peeled off one strap, then the other, before pulling down her top to reveal her glorious round breasts and those rock-hard nipples.

“You can see me okay?” she said, massaging her chest, stroking her nipples with movements specially exaggerated for her audience.

“Perfectly,” he said.

She smiled, and removed her top, and then she was lying back against the pillows, hands sweeping over her stunning curves, settling between her thighs.

Hugo could see her fingers slip under her little white panties, seeking out her heat, exploring her moisture.

She removed her underwear, and as she continued to touch herself, she angled her body so he could see everything.

So beautiful, the little sighs and gasps accentuating her breathing as her fingers glided over her chest, swept over her stomach and down her thighs, before drawing up over her mound and sinking into her soaking pussy.

“You like me watching, honey?” he asked her, seeing her fingers tracing little circles around her naked flesh, skirting over her clit, then either side of her deep red lips.

“Oh yes...” she moaned, her back arching as she briefly brought her hands up to swirl over her breasts again, grazing over her sensitive buds.

She was such an incredible sight—all that sensational smooth, clear skin, those trim lines and sweeping curves. Hugo casually considered what a waste it was that only he could see her like this. She deserved more attention than this. Deserved to be worshipped by more than just him.

That young guy from the subway would have been able to show her how truly exquisite she was. He would have produced a hardness worthy of her beauty, delighting her, making her scream, drawing out a killer orgasm before pumping her full of his seed.

Hugo felt his own hardness throbbing, and unzipped his fly to release the beast.

Why was that dark feeling of jealousy so thrilling to him now? That blackness inside him at imagining another man providing Madeleine with the kind of ride he might not be able to provide himself?

He couldn't quite understand it. Perhaps it was the same reason that people went on rollercoasters, or sat in the dark to watch a scary movie. It made the nerves jangle, it quickened the pulse.

Madeleine realized you were alive.

Hugo was shaken from his brief daze by Madeleine's increasingly desperate cries. Lying back against the pillows, one arm bent behind her head, she looked as though she was struggling for breath, fighting for oxygen—while her hand was stirring her pussy, her middle two fingers sliding up and down her slick groove and over her clit.

She shuddered, with one long breathy cry that seemed to expunge all her frustrations.

Then she relaxed, and glanced over at him, appearing to remember she was not alone.

"What are you thinking about, honey?" he asked now, hoping after his recent suggestions, she would be able to open up to him a little more.

"I'm thinking about you watching me," she said, and he got the feeling she was suddenly getting nervous again. Then almost as though concerned she would dampen the tension in the air, she added: "I'm thinking how hard I'm making you, because you're watching me."

Hugo released his cock, and it was hard—cruelly so. He was so tempted to go out there, bury his face between her thighs, taste that slick moisture glistening on her folds. But he wanted to see more of his beautiful Madeleine, hear her fantasy.

"What are you imagining is happening to you as I'm watching you?" he asked her now.

She was blushing, but smiling, loving his attention, her fingers continuing to slip into her sopping pussy now, though her climax was passed.

“You’re watching me...” she moaned, caught her breath, and then rolled over onto her stomach, her hand reaching under her body to seek out her wetness again.

Hugo squeezed his shaft, pumped it, incredibly turned on, his heart pounding inside his chest at the thought of her imagining herself with another man as her husband looked on. He couldn’t dispel himself of the idea. What was wrong with him?

He said: “What am I watching you doing, honey?”

She only moaned, plunging those fingers into her wet pussy, shaking her head to get her hair out of her face, then sliding up one knee so that her husband could see her sweet flower again.

“Is he inside you, honey?” Hugo said, feeling himself figuratively walking along a sharp edge, over which it would be so easy to slip and fall. “Is he inside you while I watch?”

The words felt so wrong coming out of his mouth, seemed so dirty, so obscene, almost heretical. Contravening their marriage vows. But they seemed to drive Madeleine on to a new level, so she was writhing in the bed as though limbering up for a belly dance, her eyes screwed shut as she drove her fingers into her tight hole, and coaxed her clit vigorously.

“Is he fucking you, sweetness?” Hugo prompted again, wondering if she could even hear him over her plaintive cries.

Then she seemed to explode, as though snapping from his interrogation, distracted from her inhibitions by her increasingly athletic masturbation. She blurted out: “He’s fucking me...”

Hugo felt a depth charge detonate inside his chest.

“Does it feel good, honey?” he asked, feeling butterflies going wild inside his stomach at the thought of what Madeleine was imagining.

“Oh, he’s so big and hard...” she groaned, her whole body swaying back and forth while she touched herself, as though someone was actually pounding into her from behind. “And I feel so bad, fucking him.”

Hugo tried to imagine someone was actually there, kneeling up against her, driving his cock inside his wife—as though he was trying to shock himself out of this strange little kink he had picked up.

But Madeleine was so beautiful, the thoughts just made Hugo harder still. Thinking how exquisite she would look in a state of total sexual fulfillment.

Now she rolled over, spreading her legs as though to allow another man entry, though it was only her hands that moved there. Arching her back, her cries turned to little yelps, and she was getting close to coming again—so quickly after the last time.

Hugo gave in to temptation and stole across that short space, launching onto the bed towards his bare, sweet wife, diving between her thighs to bury his face into her wetness.

She was just too far gone to even think about what he was doing, so Hugo found her could really indulge in her, playing her like a musical instrument, teasing out the most wonderful sounds from her as his fingers played over her skin, delved into her wetness as his hot much focused on her clit.

“Oh God, oh God... I’m cheating on my husband...” she hissed, shocking and exhilarating Hugo simultaneously.

And then she was careening towards the edge, over which there was no turning back.

Her groans turned to yelps, and she was bucking as though it were a rodeo, her hands in his hair, gripping him firmly as she rode his face, and Hugo slipped his arms around her thighs, pulling her to him to force his mouth down on her burning clit.

As he delighted in the flavor of his horny wife, she came powerfully, her burning folds quivering against his mouth and lips as he sucked on her flesh and lapped at her juices.

Afterwards, she seemed a little shocked, and more than a little apologetic, that she'd said what she had while fucking his face.

"What are you talking about? I loved it," Hugo was saying as she blamed her outbursts on getting worked up on that Subway train.

"You know I was thinking about you the whole time?" she was blushing again, still trying to catch her breath after a powerful orgasm, feeling a little awkward as though he'd caught her out.

It just wasn't natural to fantasize openly about another man while making love with your husband. Hugo appreciated that.

"But not just me."

"You were pushing me in that direction," she complained, as he pulled himself up to spoon against her, and his rock hard cock seemed to evaporate any fears she might be having about his feelings.

"It was sexy," he said. "I never usually get to find out about your actual fantasies. What really might get you going—"

"You get me going."

"And so does the thought of some other guy's huge cock pounding into you," he said, pushing his body against her, crushing his own manhood against her soft, warm behind as though emphasizing his point.

"The thing that really got me going was the thought of you watching us," she said.

The way she said "us", rather than "me", made Hugo tremble a little. It signified to him that Madeleine had genuinely been picturing herself as part of another couple that did not involve her husband.

She said: "You know that could never happen, right?"

“Right.”

“I kind of like opening up with you—about fantasies, you know?” she smiled. “But in real life, I’ll only ever be yours, Hugo Finnell.”

Hugo felt comforting warmth from her commitment to him, even if that dangerous little part of him deep inside felt a hint of disappointment that she might not ever consider pursuing one of her little crushes.

She moved slightly, subtly tilting her hips, and Hugo took the quiet invitation at face value and slip inside her, already so close to his end despite it being his first penetration all night.

He said: “You make me so hard, Madeleine Finnell. You’re my goddess, you know that?”

A sexy smile spread across her face as she moaned quietly, breathing slowly and deeply as he completely filled her with his hot manhood.

He pulled her to him, so she fit against his body as though she’d been made for him.

He whispered in her ear: “I want to worship you for the rest of my life.”

And as he came inside her, the orgasm powering through his body despite the glacial pace of their movement together, Madeleine was taken by surprise by another glorious climax of her own.

As though to reassure him, Madeleine insisted that her husband come along to the bar with her and her co-workers after the next bookstore event, even if he couldn't make the event itself.

She was actually going to introduce him to her co-workers, and Hugo found himself strangely nervous about that. The bookstore was a different world for him. What was he going to say to Fabian, knowing the man had attempted to seduce his wife—had actually kissed her?

As it happened, though, by the time the event was over, and he was tidying himself up prior to departure from the apartment, he felt ready.

Madeleine texted him to say they were all going to Jupe, a nightclub down in the Lower East Side. He told her he'd meet her there, and felt a little better since the place was hardly conducive to conversation.

He ended up meeting them all briefly outside the club in the queue, Madeleine introducing four guys—Fabian, Ryan, Dan and Cole—along with Jennifer, who was actually a college girl who worked part-time at the store.

Hugo shook all of their hands, smiling warmly, noting that the guys his wife worked with were all pretty good looking. It gave him an interesting glow to think she'd been dressing in those short skirts for these guys, flaunting her cleavage. They had, probably, had a hand in boosting her confidence massively, which made Hugo feel curiously grateful to them.

Meeting Fabian was a little strange, knowing that had things gone differently—had his relationship with Madeleine not been so strong—this guy might even have had an affair with his wife. He received a huge jolt to the heart when she first said those words: "Oh, and this is Fabian."

He was taller than Hugo, stronger, fitter. Could have been a fireman or a marine—he didn't much look like a bookstore manager. Five years older than Hugo, probably, there were flecks of gray in his closely-cropped hair, but his face had plenty of youth ingrained.

Was this Madeleine's type, if she wasn't with her husband? Tall and powerfully built?

"Hey, nice to meet you," he said, smiling warmly enough, though his eyes were checking Hugo out as though assessing the competition—seeing who it was that had locked Madeleine down, prevented his ongoing interest—and perhaps searching for any signs that Hugo knew of the kiss, knew Fabian was a threat.

"You must be the boss," Hugo offered a big smile that appeared innocent of any knowledge the tall half-Puerto Rican had in any way handled Madeleine improperly.

"That's right," Fabian said, his smile broadening.

"I've got a lot to thank you for," Hugo said. "Giving Madeleine such a great opportunity."

Fabian nodded, barely concealing his surprise at the apparent warmth in Hugo's manner toward him. "You don't need to thank me—she's a real asset for the team."

Madeleine saw how her husband interacted with the man who might have come between them, and Hugo saw surprise in her face, too. Surprised that he really wasn't angry following her confession, that he really didn't feel ill will toward Fabian despite knowing what had happened.

That he was absolutely fine with her continuing to see Fabian socially, knowing there had been an attraction between them.

The line moved relatively quickly, though, thankfully, leaving little time for conversation.

Down a set of steps, the basement nightclub was not huge, but was certainly popular, with hardly a space to stand without brushing into someone else.

Their first stop was the bar, and Hugo ordered a double vodka to help him catch up with the others, who had been supping wine all evening and now moved on to spirits.

As the others hit the dance floor, Hugo found it was so busy he could suitably blend in with the crowd, dancing innocuously with Madeleine, who gave him occasional pitying but grateful glances knowing he wasn't much of a dancer, or one for nightclubs at all for that matter, but was doing his best to keep up.

She did look hot.

Straw-colored hair tied loosely in a ponytail, she was wearing a dark green and black dress that looked almost like a smart play on camouflage, and practically skin-tight seemed to enhance her shape beautifully from the perky rise of her cleavage down to her nylon-clad thighs. Occasionally as they were dancing, it would creep up to show she was wearing hold-ups, not pantyhose, which made her look unbelievably sexy, though periodically she had to keep pulling her dress back down.

The dancing also gave her a pink glow in her face that made Hugo feel a little light-headed, reminding him a little of her performances at home.

Her colleagues left her dancing with Hugo to start with, but as the drinks began to roll through them, Ryan, Dan and Cole started getting closer to them, occasionally nudging into her as they moved to the heavy beat, causing Madeleine to look up at her husband and flash him an impish grin.

Hugo raised his eyebrows in mock shock at how increasingly brazen they were being—but then as he broke out into a broad smile, he gave a slight nod of his head that said clearly—why don't you dance with them, if they want you to?

This came as a genuine surprise to Madeleine. Though he'd told her of his dark little fantasies in the bedroom, it seemed that she hadn't entirely believed he was comfortable with her flirting with other men in real life.

Now, she tentatively turned to Ryan, and started dancing with him while looking back at her husband, seeing how he was taking it.

Hugo laughed lightly, as though to hide his true feelings. But it wasn't really jealousy, and certainly wasn't anger, that he was trying to hide. It was hot seeing her standing close to Ryan, gazing up at him, smiling flirtatiously in a way she didn't—couldn't—with her husband, since they were already married, already so familiar. It was exciting to see that.

He had to be careful not to show too much enthusiasm for her dancing with others, though. He didn't want her co-workers to think her husband was a freak.

The dance floor was so packed, when she danced with Ryan—and then Dan, and then Cole—she had to stand so close she was touching them. Almost slow-dancing, though her hands and those of her dance partners kept to themselves.

Fabian kept away from her, which was perhaps understandable, though Hugo felt he would have coped seeing them dance together.

Later, Hugo stepped out for a bathroom break, and when he came back he merged into the melee that was the club's bar, deciding a few glasses of ice-cold water might go down well when he returned to the group.

The wait for the bar was a long one, but while he stood there in the darkness, shuffling forward at the pace of a glacier, he could actually see through to the dance floor and just about spot Madeleine and her friends.

He watched his pretty wife dancing with Dan, and then with Ryan again, her face shining with flirtatious yet innocent energy—simply having fun, but perhaps also enjoying their eyes trailing over her from time to time, taking in the sight of her in that cute little dress, perhaps even half a thought to what might have happened if they had all been single.

Hugo saw Madeleine sharing laughter with Jennifer even while she was dancing close with Jennifer's current squeeze, Cole, and it was clear the whole thing was innocent. Yet there was a pang of jealousy in Hugo as he watched his beloved with the other men—a feeling that he found strangely beguiling.

In the old days in Boston, he felt certain he would have felt furious about her getting close to other guys—but then in the early period of their relationship, Madeleine had never really looked at another man, far less danced with one. Now, though, so far into their partnership and their marriage, she seemed relaxed, mature, confident enough in what they had to tease a couple of young bucks and prove to herself and others that she still had it.

Hugo didn't feel angry at all, perhaps because he too was so assured that nothing could threaten what he had with Madeleine. She had his ring, she had his surname.

Watching her perform for another man turned his insides to molten lava. His heart pounded to see her looking up at Ryan or Dan, her pretty face breaking out into that glorious smile usually reserved for him. His cock strained against his tight jeans as he saw her reach up to place her hands behind Dan's neck as they were slow-dancing so sensually, she almost looked as though she was about to kiss him.

She was teasing them, everyone knowing her husband was near, sensing the risk while tempted by the reward.

Hugo saw her sensual slow dance and it made him think these were guys she must have fantasized about from time to time, while she'd been touching herself all those evenings before her husband had plucked up the courage to join her in her sexual re-awakening.

She was even putting her arms around Dan as though they were an item, and it sent ripples of sexual energy through Hugo's entire body—some kind of primal response that in the wilds of prehistory might have prepared him to go straight in there, drag his woman away and be instantly ready to take her and fertilize her.

Far from feeling bad at all, watching her dance closely with her friends from the store made him feel a curious sense of comfort—she was having fun, she was really enjoying herself, and he didn't need to worry that she was sad because they'd moved away to a strange new city to suit Hugo's job.

What was astounding to him was the dark little feeling deep inside that hoped she might feel tempted one day to go a little further than just dancing with Ryan or Dan, or even Fabian. She'd come home one day from one of her nights out glowing, flushed by her exhilarating experience, asking her husband for permission to see Ryan or Dan—or even Fabian—on a little more of a personal basis.

He could see the slight sheen of perspiration on her forehead as he returned with an armful of iced water and she broke apart from her friend Dan—looking so ravishing.

“Hey! Where were you?” she had to shout over the forceful beat of the music, but he caught the slight look in her eyes that was assessing his reaction to seeing her arms playfully around another man.

“Takes a while to get served in here!” he bellowed back, his face breaking out into the broadest of smiles, which he hoped was demonstration enough that he was delighted she was having fun.

“Not sure how much more I can take!” she yelled, and Hugo felt fireworks exploding inside him as she flashed him the most bright, exquisite smile of the evening.

The others were hugely grateful for the cold refreshment Hugo now doled out, but he caught a new note of respect and—perhaps—admiration from Ryan and Dan, that it had been Hugo who had ensnared Madeleine, that she was with him and obviously still obsessed with him.

Hugo realized that part of the severe arousal seeing her dancing with them was the simple fact that they saw her as intensely desirable, yet she was his. She was a real prize, and he had won her.

A slower dance track came on, and Madeleine made Hugo her priority, pulling him further into the melee on the dance floor and away from her bookstore playmates. They were surrounded by hundreds of people, packed into the dance floor like sardines in a can, but away from anyone they knew, it was almost as though they had privacy.

Madeleine reached up to put her arms around him, while his hands were on her waist, pulling her close to him. The music was pulsing deep through their bodies, the light somehow dipping even lower now it was so late into the small hours. Hugo felt electric being so close to this beautiful siren, who seemed to so bewitch her co-workers.

Holding her tight, he breathed her cherry-vanilla scent, felt the heat of her body through her thin dress, the softness of her cheek against his.

It was making him so hard as he danced against her, and initially he felt a touch embarrassed at reacting so obviously in such a public place—but then Madeleine pushed into him, grinding herself on his swollen shaft, loving it as the outward signs of his furious attraction to her.

Hugo found his hands slipping on her body, down to her deliciously round behind. He found himself risking censure as his hands ventured under her dress, cupping her buttocks now skin-to-skin. But she did not castigate him in any way—in fact, she gave him a devilish grin, encouraging him, even wiggling her behind to spur him on in coaxing her bare flesh, groping her outrageously though it was too dark for anyone else to see.

As the music went comparatively quieter for a moment or two, transitioning to another track, Hugo leaned into her ear, said: “This how it is when you dance with them?”

She flashed her eyes at him, surprised at him though they’d already played around with the idea of her having a crush, of her even imagining being with another man.

But he saw in her eyes and her flushed cheeks that she was as affected by alcohol as he was, and it had weakened her inhibitions in the same way it had his.

“Sometimes,” she whispered in his ear, “I can feel them against me.”

Her dress was riding up, and she was grinding her pussy against his erect cock, only his pants and her tiny thong in the way, and that depraved flicker of light in her eyes made the silent but indecent suggestion that this was how it was for her sometimes, dancing with her co-workers, pressing her tingling pussy firmly against them, feeling how hard she made them.

“Naughty,” he said.

She grinned. “But neither of them are as big as you, sweetie.”

She reached behind her, and grabbed one of his hands, and he allowed her to sweep it around her thigh, over that smooth skin of hers that could drive him crazy—until she was pushing his hand between her legs, against the soaking scrap of material covering her pussy.

She leaned up to whisper in his ear again, “None of them make me as wet as you do.”

Hugo felt a little dizzy with desire for her, feeling just how saturated her panties were, his finger tracing out the shape of her slit through the wet scrap of material, making her lean against him and moan in his ear as they continued to dance, only the two of them knowing he was stroking her pussy.

He heard her gasp as his finger found its way inside her panties, brushing her soft sprinkle of hair before finding her well, dipping inside her, coating itself in her juices before gliding inside her tight channel.

It felt so wicked to touch her like that, to penetrate her while others were dancing so close there might not be enough space for them to dance apart.

Hugo leaned into her ear again, said: “If you could take one of them home, which one would it be?”

He brought his dripping finger up to his face as they broke apart a little, Madeleine looking briefly startled as he brought her wetness to his nose, breathed in her scent, touched his digit to his lips to taste her, whether from his open sampling of her flavor in the middle of this dance floor or his question about her co-workers.

“With us, or with me?” she said with a sassy smirk.

The pounding of his heart blended with the pulsing music and Hugo felt a curious connection with it, as though his powerful fear and arousal at the thought of Madeleine taking one of her co-workers home with her—instead or along with her husband—was actually driving the music to which all around them moved.

After a beat or two, she pushed her mouth against his ear, said: “Ryan has a bigger cock.”

Her pixie grin hid whether she was telling the truth or simply winding him up, but then she added: “Dan’s a better kisser.”

Hugo chuckled, only half confident she was bluffing now, the other half of his self feeling that blend of jealousy and exhilaration that made him want to scream and run and cheer and hide all at the same time.

“You only get one,” he said, and her little nod made him feel more assured that their discussion was hypothetical, at this stage at least.

She said: “You know you’re the perfect package? An even better kisser and an even bigger cock?”

Hugo laughed, feeling exhilaration coursing through his veins. How fortunate he was to have such a beautiful wife, who loved him, who offered the hope of sharing his sexual fantasies, who valued him above all others. Any other wife might take his revelation of a fantasy about her consensual infidelity and immediately push him to make it reality—or start playing around behind his back with the sense of justification that this was his fantasy too, only he didn't know.

For now, hypothetical or not, he had the rosy glow in her cheeks, the twinkle in her eye, the spring in her step to make him feel glorious about the world. The wickedness in her gaze as she leaned into him and said: "I choose Ryan."

Her clear hint, that she wanted Ryan for his cock, ignited a fire inside Hugo's chest.

The smell of sweat and dry ice and booze and perhaps even a little marijuana smoke stained the hot air, but Hugo shivered as he inhaled the spice from her pussy. He wanted more.

He looked around them momentarily. It was so crowded, but people around them seemed to be in a world of their own, dancing, moving to the beat, aware only of the music. Even with lights swirling around them, it was so dark in that sweaty nightclub Hugo felt a whisper of confidence.

Madeleine raised an eyebrow to question the smile that grew on his lips, but then he was sinking down, and she was looking faintly frightened and even horrified at what was on his mind as he looked up at her yet dropped to his knees right there on the dance floor.

There was so little space, he was almost kneeling between her ankles—and yet checking on his surroundings, it appeared he was not being observed.

Hugo splayed his hands over her thighs, loving her soft, slightly clammy skin, pushing up her dress to reveal her little white thong panties. Looking down, she gave another sharp warning glance, but she wasn't stopping him. She was as turned on as he was, and she had the cushion of alcohol too.

As he eased close to her body, drawing his nose over her thigh and up to hover by her covered sex, he saw her checking around her, seeing that they were not watched.

Her hands, which had been nervously poised either side of her crotch, ready to shield herself at a moment's notice, now moved aside, opening herself to him. He found it thrilling that she now moved her hands to her hips, holding up her skirt for him—approving, almost demanding, his intention to move in on her sex.

He did not need any further prompting, but he surprised her again by hooking his fingers into the waistband of her panties, then dragging them down her thighs. She pushed her dress down, suddenly afraid of being caught, but as Hugo drew her damp underwear over her knees and down to her ankles, she saw around them that their neighbors were still all caught up in the music, and that the darkness made it difficult for anyone—even her—to see what was going on between her thighs.

Hugo loved that she willingly stepped out of her panties, again giving him a clear message that she wanted this so badly. Then he was pushing up her dress again, and she wasn't stopping him at all, in fact she edged her thighs apart to ease his access, letting him zone in on her irresistible flower.

He felt her flinch as he connected with her tender folds, but she was so wet it was obvious she was ready for him. Her flavor quickly saturated his mouth, her juices threatening to run down his chin as he licked her, his tongue, his lips forced steadily against her and inside her with growing pressure while her soft down tickled his nose. It was mere moments before he felt the rapturous grip of her hands on his head, pulling him to her, showing him where to be, demanding his mouth where she needed it, forcing him into blissful connection with her pussy.

Oh it felt so wicked, kneeling before her while so many surrounded them so closely, all his senses saturated by her sex. He wanted desperately to make her come there on the dance floor, but the way she continued to move with the music, and the way she'd started trembling and shaking the moment he'd sunk to his knees and nudged into her, it was almost impossible to tell whether she was approaching orgasm, reaching it or nowhere near at all.

After a period of time he simply could not gauge, he felt her pressing his head to her, her thighs locking against him, her soft body so hot all around him, and he wondered if this was it, this was her coming while hundreds of people pressed in against them. But after a moment or two, she forced him up, pulling on his shoulders and his arms, getting her back up so that she could kiss him briefly, tasting herself on his lips, her eyes sparked full of lights—and a moment later, she was dragging him from the dance floor, flicking a very brief goodbye to her bemused co-workers on the way out, Hugo following along obediently out to the street and an awaiting taxi.

She wanted him so badly—and yet Hugo felt she couldn't possibly have come there on the dance floor if she still needed something more to satisfy herself. It disappointed him a little, though now inside the cab as she couldn't keep her hands off him, he was really looking forward to getting home.

"I should take you dancing more often, young Hugo Finnell," she breathed as she resumed kissing him, surprising him a little by how she appeared to enjoy the taste of herself on his mouth.

"As long as you promise to wear a scandalously short dress, young Madeleine Finnell," he replied with a grin.

She offered him an eye-roll: "You men really do just want us to dress like hookers, don't you?"

"Why do you think hookers dress that way?" he chuckled.

Then her expression turned briefly to mild concern as she said: "You did have an okay time? I didn't think we'd be out as late as this..."

"It was fantastic," he said, so genuine that he saw his wife relax into relief and contentment. "You know how hot you are when you're dancing with your co-workers?"

“Well, I had to tone some of it down a little,” she teased. “Didn’t want you feeling jealous.”

“You don’t need to tone anything down for my sake,” he said.

When they got a block from home and the traffic lights seemed jammed on red, Madeleine was not for waiting—jabbing a twenty at the baffled driver, and then urging her husband out onto the street. Alcohol still coursed through their bodies, and for Hugo it made it seem as though they were in some kind of hypnotic dream state—he wasn’t aware of when it started, but then he found he was chasing after his wife up the street, tearing around the corner and down to their building front door, before he chased her into the building and the elevator before wrapping her in his arms for the ride up to their floor.

She was giggling and loving his attention as he had kissed her neck, his hands running all over her body—but also hissing warnings that they were still essentially in public, and the doors could open to expose them at any moment.

Once in their apartment, it was an immediate dash into the bedroom, and they were both struggling to rip off each others’ clothing as quickly as possible.

Hugo couldn’t remember a time when he was this frantic to get naked, to make love to Madeleine. Seeing her dancing with Ryan and Dan—getting the sense from it that this wasn’t the first time for them, and that if Hugo hadn’t happened to be there this time, they might have really gone at it, crushing against each other, their hands sliding all over each others’ hot clammy flesh. The choice Madeleine had made, even hypothetically, to favor Ryan over Dan if she was going to take one home—the thought that she knew how big their cocks were, what they felt against her on the dance floor. Then going down on her in the middle of a crowded dance floor—that had all been too much.

He almost forced her down on the bed—though she went completely willingly, apparently thrilled at his forcefulness, burying her face in the pillows and pushing her naked behind up obscenely for him to target. He needed to take her, hard, now. After seeing her with Ryan and Dan, he needed to reclaim her, he needed to reassert his position as leader of her pack, the alpha male for her world.

He grabbed her hips, pulled her to him, and without prevarication directed his bare, huge, swollen cock to her dripping entrance. She gasped as he pierced her, and then filled her, gripping her behind as he split her cheeks with his full length, manhandling her almost brutally as he began to thrust into her.

His climax was not far away, but hers came first as he fucked her so hard, her pussy so unbelievably wet as he rammed his final few strokes into her, his come erupting deep inside her to finally mark her as his territory.

“You’ve never done it like that before,” she said breathlessly, astonished at the change in him, her kind and gentle husband turned beast by an evening in a night club.

“I didn’t hurt you?”

“Oh no...” she grinned broadly. “I mean, I might be a little sore in the morning, but it was totally worth it. I really have to take you dancing more often!”

“Seeing you with them... thinking about you with them... I just needed to take you back, make you mine again.”

She was almost purring, gently touching herself between her legs as though still in faint disbelief at what they had just done. “You know I’ll always be yours, right? You don’t have to take me back.”

“Oh, I know. But when you’re with other guys, when you’re all over them it just triggers something deep down—I can’t help myself.”

“Oh, I love it. You’re such an amazing husband, you know that?”

And hearing her say that made any hardship he faced in dealing with his dark fantasy completely and entirely worthwhile.

Seven

“You know that piano player over there keeps looking up your skirt?”

Perched on a bar stool, Madeleine snapped her knees together.

“You are a bad, bad man, Hugo Finnell,” she said, but there was a deliciously wicked glint in her eyes.

After the success of their anniversary dinner, the two of them had come out together for another evening out. Thus was constituted Date Night, which the two of them wanted to be a regular night out where they could really focus on each other.

They might have rekindled their passion, but ensuring it did not wane again was going to take dedication—they both saw that. A regular night where they could simply let go and remember they were still just dating, even if they both had rings and knew they had each other for life—they were still discovering each other, still exploring each other, still teasing and flirting and seducing each other.

“I’m not kidding. He keeps sneaking looks up your dress.”

“He is not—”

Madeleine suddenly drew in her breath—looking over the rim of her wine glass, as though the remaining traces of Sauvignon Blanc would keep her from discovery, she saw the pianist’s eyes dash toward her, then away.

“You are wearing a scandalously short dress,” Hugo noted dryly.

“I thought you might like it.”

“I do like it.”

“Maybe we should go find a table instead,” Madeleine said, but Hugo saw her attention flick over, almost imperceptibly, to the piano player again, to determine that he was still checking her out.

And there, he saw her very subtly turn on her stool so that any glance her way might afford the man another view up her dress.

“We can’t move—you’re having too much fun,” Hugo said, and now he stood to draw the attention of the bartender, signaling for a top-up of their drinks.

As the drinks were poured, Madeleine looked at her husband, and tucked a rogue strand of her golden hair behind her ear before rubbing her legs together, clearly teasing the piano player again. Hugo flashed his eyes knowingly at her while the bartender finished pouring his single malt.

Now Madeleine was crossing her legs, stroking her long hair as though flirting with someone. Hugo subtly glanced over towards the pianist, and caught his surreptitious monitoring of Madeleine’s position.

“You like the look of him?” he asked her, feeling off, even after everything.

“He’s cute.”

He didn’t blame the guy for looking. Madeleine did look incredible with those smooth legs, and that little dress molded to her figure while covering surprisingly little. It made Hugo feel all warm inside, not really jealous. Proud, perhaps, lucky. Seriously aroused. The guy wasn’t doing anything other than looking—no harm in that—and the effect of it on Madeleine was palpable. A youngish African-American—probably a few years younger than them—he was coolly confident in himself, occasionally flashing a charming smile at guests, no doubt including Madeleine.

Hugo could see the rise of her chest enhanced by the thrill of the extra attention on her—she was breathing deeply. He could also see her hips fidgeting.

“You’re going to put him off his music,” he said to her now, as the bartender retreated to tend to another guy at the other end of the bar.

“You wanna bet me I can?” she grinned, pulling the hem of her dress down as far as she could over her thighs—which was hardly very far at all—as though bashful.

“Sure. Without leaving the stool,” he said.

“Okay,” she said. “If I can’t do it... I promise you can watch me do whatever you want me to do when we get home.”

“You won’t change immediately into sweatpants?”

“I won’t change into sweatpants.”

Hugo felt his loins tingling, his cock thickening at the thought of unpeeling her dress. Madeleine gave him the kind of smoldering gaze that made him strongly suspect she’d be willing to do that for him even without losing a bet. She still seemed to feel somehow indebted to him for forgiving her little transgression at the bookstore, though she didn’t need to.

“And if you can?” he asked her.

She shifted a little in her seat, and he could tell she was tingling between her thighs as well.

After pondering, she gave him a wicked look, and said in a low voice: “If I can, then you have to make me come without leaving the building.”

Hugo shivered in anticipation, though he immediately began trying to figure out how such a thing might be possible.

“Okay,” he said. “Go on then.”

“Sure?” she grinned.

“I bet you can’t do it.”

Madeleine flashed him a wicked glance, and seated there opposite him in the barstool, she lifted her behind, reached under her tiny little dress, and slipped off her panties. The piano man didn’t stand a chance.

Hugo couldn’t quite believe the beautiful blonde sitting just a few feet away from him on another bar stool was quite the same woman he’d married.

Had she really just handed him her damp little panties and then continued their conversation as though nothing untoward had happened whatsoever?

Talking about Lucy finding a new apartment in Brooklyn, about the fact that she was likely to move down from Boston in just a few days, all the while sitting on that stool, her dress so short her bare thighs made the faux leather creak every time she moved.

“...you get so much more space for the money over there...”

Allowing the piano player to continue peering up her legs—only this time, there was no longer a little triangle of white lace at the apex to obscure her heavenly delights.

“...her father grew up down in Vinegar Hill, you know...”

“Uh-huh,” Hugo not entirely listening to her, and this time she knew he wasn’t and didn’t really care for once, loving his eyes on her, the fact he was captivated by her.

Only, then the piano player got up and left, leaving the two of them looking at each other, a touch disappointed. Who claimed the win if the subject of their wager threw in the towel?

Maybe he was just away for a cigarette break. Hugo wondered if he had to cool down a little after catching sight of what Madeleine had just been showing him.

“So I like this,” Madeleine said quietly, dropping her whole vacuous conversation about her friend’s migration across the East River now that she didn’t have a piano player to shock.

“I’ll say,” he said, loving that he was allowed to ogle his wife, while other men might only be able to take sneaky looks.

“No, I mean Date Night,” she said, though she liked that she was able to turn her husband’s head with that short dress, providing amusement even with their wager on hold.

“Oh, right, yes. That too.”

“Yes. But we weren’t in a great place, were we?”

“No, we weren’t. But that’s all behind us, isn’t it?” For a moment, forgetting where they were, what she was doing with regard to their little side bet, Madeleine seemed deeply regretful for what her condition had meant for her husband all those years.

“Completely behind us,” he said, attempting to sound confident, though it wasn’t up to him whether or not they left her condition behind.

She smiled. Said: “I feel like we have so much to catch up on, we’ve missed so much, haven’t we?”

“I guess we have Date Night to help catch up.”

“Not just Date Night.”

Both of them were distracted by the return of the piano player, which seemed to lighten the mood again.

Hugo saw his wife remember what she was supposed to be doing on that bar stool under the terms of their bet, then she was opening her legs a little more, allowing light to penetrate the vale between her thighs.

Hugo had to try to resist the temptation to turn his head to check on whether there was any impact on the pianist. He didn’t want to tip the guy off to their interest in him.

“It’s kind of sexy, isn’t it?” she smiled warmly, seeing her husband’s eyes trailing up her bare thighs, and the slight hint of frustration that from where he was sitting, he couldn’t quite see what he wanted.

“Date Night?” Hugo wasn’t sure if she wasn’t now referring to her little show for the piano player. Or trying to continue their conversation as cover.

“Well, we both get to dress nicely for each other, and spend a nice evening out on the town—and then we know we can get home and tear off each other’s clothes...”

“Assuming the sweat pants don’t come out,” Hugo teased.

“Okay, okay,” she grinned, taking the hit. “So new rule for Date Night—no sweat pants allowed.”

“Good rule. I can work with that.”

Madeleine said, suddenly serious: “You know, I thought you didn’t really find me attractive any more... you know, sexually.”

“Are you kidding?” he chuckled. “You drive me crazy. Every time I see you.”

“Crazy?” One of her eyebrows bobbed up, and almost as though to reward his answer, she slipped a couple of fingers under the hem of her dress and shifted it up her thighs an inch or two, offering him a little more of her smooth skin.

Her show wasn’t merely for the benefit of the piano player, it seemed.

Explaining, he said: “You’re so cheerful now...”

She giggled, “And that drives you crazy?”

He shrugged. “Three and a half years, you were miserable. It wasn’t your fault—it was the condition. But it kind of sapped the energy out of me. But every now and then—maybe only every few months—something would make you smile. Best of all was when I made you smile. That made me feel so incredible... what can I say? Those little moments gave me the energy to get through the dark times.”

She looked at him, pitying him, but also clearly grateful for the support he’d provided during those dark times.

He continued: “You know, I learned to really make the most of those little smiles you occasionally gave me—you know, to make myself feel better.”

“Really? Sweetie!” Madeleine flashed her eyes, opened her mouth wide in melodramatic shock. This from a girl trying to reenact a key scene from the movie Basic Instinct right there on her barstool.

Nevertheless, Hugo found his cheeks heating up in a mild blush. “You know guys have needs, even if they can’t be... fulfilled.”

He nodded. “Thing is,” he said, “I kind of got used to that situation, and since you started your treatment, and you’re happy a lot of the time now...”

“Really?”

“God, I feel like a horny teenager again.”

“Sweetie...” Madeleine was positively beaming, and now fanned her face to make light of her highly aroused state. She glanced around to see if anyone other than her husband or the targeted piano player was noticing her state of undress. Then she slipped her dress up a little more on her thighs.

“Can you see?” she whispered, her wedding ring glinting in the light as she lifted the garment even further, opening up the view between her legs especially for him.

Hugo caught his breath as he laid eyes on the little dusting of gold on her sweet mound, and around the soft pink folds of her pussy. “You’re so beautiful,” he breathed.

“It feels so wicked,” she whispered in reply, and now glanced past her husband to see if the piano player had noticed.

Hugo couldn’t see what was going on behind him, but he could tell from his wife’s face that she wasn’t being ignored. There was a kind of glow about her, an underlying bloom of pride and delicious arousal.

He saw her shift one knee just an inch or two further to the side, opening herself even further to the stranger’s gaze, and heard her utter a tiny little gasp. Hugo felt the heat of jealousy and raw excitement burst inside his chest at the thought that another man was checking out his wife’s most intimate parts.

“He can see me,” she said so quietly her husband almost couldn’t hear it over the tinkle of the piano behind. “He’s looking up my dress.”

Madeleine suddenly looked Hugo right in the eyes, blushing furiously, as though she’d suddenly decided that staring direct at her husband was the safest way to avoid her new admirer's gaze, to protect her reputation while a stranger feasted his eyes on her bare pussy.

She seemed really embarrassed, and yet also seriously turned on—and somehow Hugo felt in-tune with her confusing mix of emotions, since his own cocktail of white-hot jealousy and blistering arousal had that same conflicting chaos.

Hugo saw her knees quivering a little, as though there was a little war going on inside her to keep her legs open—her powerful sense of excitement in pitched battle against her innate sense of shame.

“He’s good,” Hugo said, trying to appear calm and collected. “He hasn’t tripped over his piano keys yet.”

“Oh God, Hugo,” she said, and he heard a tremor in her voice. “I’m not sure I can handle this after all.”

“We can go home any time you like, honey.”

“No...” she said, a wicked glimmer returning to her eyes, pushing out the fear. “I have a bet to win.”

Without warning, she suddenly and quietly lifted her right knee, resting her foot on the edge of her stool, completely opening up her pussy for public view, her dress appearing to be nothing more than a shirt. Now it was Hugo’s turn to gasp—he could see her beautiful flower in all its glory, her lips flushed with arousal and glistening with her excitement.

Both of them suddenly noticed movement off to the right, and turned to catch sight of their waiter the split second before the extraordinary distraction at the bar caused him to knock into a table, pitching the tray he had been carrying forward to split its collection of glasses everywhere.

Madeleine suddenly slapped her thighs together, but as the waiter stood frozen by what he’d seen, in that instant as the glasses crashed to Earth, obliterating the peaceful atmosphere of the empty restaurant, both she and Hugo heard the piano player suddenly stumble over his keyboard, his music grinding to a halt.

She didn't care if she'd won the bet indirectly—by affecting the waiter, whose dropping of glassware then disrupted the music.

Madeleine shot her arms up into the air, whooping at least semi-drunkenly in her glorious victory.

“So,” Hugo said, “where do you want your reward?”

Eight

Hugo woke the next morning to the news—by text message—that he was needed in the office, on a Saturday of all days. A groan of frustration escaped him before he controlled himself, not wanting to wake a shattered Madeleine.

He was still tired after what had turned into a superb evening, but as he hauled himself out of bed and threw himself into the shower, leaving his beautiful bride asleep, he felt seriously content with life.

Hugo found his cock thickening up in the shower as he washed himself, the memories of devouring Madeleine the night before strong in his mind.

He had to resist delay, however. His call to the office was urgent—no doubt some client or other getting themselves in a fix. It was always the damage limitation work, brand protection, that dragged PR people at the firm into work at irregular hours.

Madeleine was really out for the count, even as he finished up dressing. Unwilling to wake her prematurely, no doubt to a headache, he simply fetched a glass of ice water, placed a little bottle of Tylenol next to it on her bedside table, before jotting down a note on a post-it about being suddenly called into the office.

Then he headed out the door. At least these urgent calls into the office meant he was allowed to claim back a taxi receipt.

As he sat there in the back of a cab, trying not to choke from the driver's heady air freshener as the vehicle negotiated its way through the traffic up Fifth, Hugo's mind drifted back to Madeleine.

She had certainly been fired up by flashing that piano player. Jesus, the guy had seen her pussy in all its glory.

Hugo felt a curious loss of control. It did frighten him, even though it excited him at the same time. The idea of an independent, strong, sexually powerful wife was extraordinarily attractive – but the fact she might, in her independence, choose to reject him, or prioritize someone else above him, was terrifying.

Well, he had to trust her. That was the bottom line—and in marriage, if there was no trust, the relationship was flawed anyway.

Sitting there, helpless as the traffic snarled up close to Central Park, he tried to dwell more on the exciting thoughts, of Madeleine teasing the guys at work with those short skirts and hints of lace underwear. He tried to focus on the alpha-male buzz he got from the idea that when all was said and done, she came home to him. There might be plenty of upstarts sniffing her tail, but he was the leader of her pack.

Madeleine was so beautiful, so bright and vivacious, her husband simply wanted to worship her—and he found that he liked the idea of others worshipping her, too.

The thought that got him going most of all, however—that got him so hard as the taxi pulled up outside the firm's building that he worried about people noticing as he stepped out of the vehicle onto the curb—was the thought that some day, Madeleine would feel confident enough or tipsy enough to try a little more than flirting, even actual physical connection with another man.

The look on her face from such an illicit thrill would be priceless.

The whole day, he actually found himself battling against his nerves, wondering what Madeleine was thinking as she woke up, remembered the events of the previous night, and returned to work—where perhaps, she would run into the guy she'd kissed.

During the morning, he sent three text messages to her, checking she was feeling okay, that everything was good after the previous night. Yet it got to noon, and she still hadn't responded.

His paranoia turned her lack of response into the possibility she wasn't happy about what happened the previous night, she was ashamed at displaying herself so provocatively in front of that piano player.

Maybe she'd blame the drink, but maybe she'd blame her husband and this weird new attitude of his regarding her flirtation with others.

Then around noon, a simple little text came back from her

> Sorry, didn't realize phone was out of batteries. Not entirely thinking straight today.

The smiley-face emoticon she added to the end of her text warmed his heart considerably.

Hugo sent a text back:

> Me neither. Can't stop thinking about last night.

It was a fairly neutral text, could have gone either way. If she had negative feelings about the previous night, he could turn it into telling her he was concerned about things, too. If she had positive feelings, she would read it as his sharing her lusty thoughts about what had happened.

It was still a nervy few minutes until her next text came in, shaking him up a little as his phone beeped on receiving her next message.

> Can we have Date Nights like that every week?

This time, she added an emoticon with a tongue sticking out of its mouth. Hugo felt a tingling inside his loins, his insides filled with the warmth of knowing Madeleine was happy about the previous night's events.

> Often as you like.

He replied with his own smiley-face at the end of the text.

> You had a good time?

> Loved every minute.

> I can't quite believe it all happened. Guess I had too much to drink.

> You're so sexy when you're tipsy

> You had hardly anything—you had no excuse. Can't believe you just sat there and let me.

> You loved every minute of it

> I loved winning our bet

Hugo felt his sleeping tiger really stir as he read that text from her.

She signed off with another tongue-sticking-out emoticon, and then Hugo had to get back to work—no doubt Madeleine did, too.

A day of meetings about how to manage a certain crisis in which a mouse had been found inside a jar of baby food for one of the company's large manufacturer clients finally slowed around mid-afternoon.

Hugo had done his bit, writing three completely different drafts of a press release to take into account the changing view of the client's lawyers through the day. But at last, things were winding down.

By four, they were all merely waiting around waiting for the client to finally approve everything.

Hugo naturally found his mind wandering back to thoughts of Madeleine. He found himself picking up his phone to check for any messages. There was a text from Madeleine sent mid-morning while he'd obviously been too busy to see it.

> Oops, guess I forgot to wear panties today.

He was instantly stiffening up after reading that, and regretted not knowing she'd sent it earlier, though he probably wouldn't have been in a position to do anything about it.

He sent a text back saying:

> Naughty girl. Just picked up your text. Your co-workers realized yet?

He had to wait 15 minutes, but then her reply came back:

> Think it's actually been too busy today for any of that! It did feel so sexy, though. And after I texted you, I kept thinking about how you might feel knowing ;-)

He assumed 'any of that' merely meant flirting with her colleagues during work. It was so hot to think of her working a whole Saturday shift with a bare pussy that might be seen if anything happened with her skirt.

He replied:

> Only just found out—instant stiffness ;-)

She said:

> Okay—I have two hours left of my shift—if you keep telling me things like that I'll be dripping all over the books.

He smiled, but was chomping at the bit at the thought of her getting wet and juicy thinking about him.

She asked him what he wanted to do that evening, and he knew he wasn't going to have the energy to go out, not after a weekend day of crisis management—and probably not after such an exhilarating but ultimately exhausting date night.

Right now, he wanted nothing more than an evening in with his pretty blonde wife.

He texted her back:

> As soon as you're done at the bookstore, I want you to go home and start warming yourself up for me.

It was probably a little presumptive, a little more assertive or even overbearing than she might be used to with him—but she hadn't indicated that she had other plans that evening.

> Warm myself up? Whatever might you mean by that?

Her text reply made him smile. He felt the door opening for a little dominant energy.

> You know what I mean. The minute your shift is over, I want you to go home, grab a bite to eat and then take off your clothes and wait for me in bed.

She replied:

> And this is mandatory?

Hugo smiled again, at her injection of mild protest. He could tell she was interested, or she would have sent something back about being tired, perhaps that he shouldn't push her so soon after what happened at the bar the previous night. But she didn't.

> The grabbing a bite part is optional, but just thought you might want to keep your energy levels up.

> And what am I supposed to do while I'm lying in bed, naked, waiting for you?

> As I indicated before—warm yourself up for me.

> You might have to help me with something to think about while I do. I'm not sure I can do without my husband's firm guidance.

> I've got some firm guidance in my pants right now that you can think about.

> Okay—I really do have customers I'm supposed to be serving.

> Two hours. Then you serve me.

He chuckled. This was kind of fun—they hadn't really played with him being in any way dominant. It didn't come entirely naturally to him, particularly around Madeleine, but maybe it would be fun. He just had to hope that things at work finished up in good time for him to get home and enjoy his warmed-up wife.

The client would probably want some changes made to the latest draft, and then some more reassurance that their entire business wouldn't be destroyed by the actions of a disgruntled now-former employee.

But ten minutes later, Ray popped his head over Hugo's cubicle with a relieved smile plastered all over his face.

"All done," he said.

"Done? They don't want changes?"

"Nope—completely happy, ready to roll. Davis will handle any press calls from here—we're done! Hey—you fancy a drink? Could probably catch the tail-end of Notre Dame.”

Hugo felt a little funny sitting in Ray’s presence with an erection. It was subsiding, but it still had enough power to affect his decision-making. He shook his head: “Got to get home, I’m afraid. Plans tonight.”

Ray nodded the nod of marital solidarity. “My wife thinks I’m still at work and it could take all night,” he said. “Sure you don’t want to come along? We could hit a strip joint later.”

Hugo wasn’t in the least bit tempted to choose a visit to a strip joint in the company of his discreditable colleague over an evening home with the prospect of trying something new with his seriously sexy better half.

“Lowego will probably want to go,” he suggested to Ray, but the other man shook his head.

“Lowego is still in the process of reclaiming his wife. Jesus. Lightweights!”

Almost two hours until Madeleine’s shift was over, and walking out of the office building down to the nearest subway stop, Hugo half wondered if he should have at least shared a drink or two with Ray.

Sitting on the subway train as it rattled and shook its way home, he found himself thinking about Ray’s offhand remark about Lowego patching it up with his wife. “Reclaiming”, he’d said. Was Hugo insane to find that notion deeply arousing? His wife had fooled around with another man—fucked another man, repeatedly—and now Lowego was going to reclaim her. She was used, dirty, messed up, but so desirable she could have another man as easy as pie—as she’d shown by her affair. And Lowego was going to have to make her his own.

God, such a fantasy probably objectified the wife, turning her into something to be fought over, to be reclaimed after falling into the hands of another. But Hugo preferred to think of the fantasy setting up the wife as a fiery independent, who could choose to go off and violate her wedding vows if she so wanted, but might now be tamed by a careful and attentive husband.

He thought about how Lowego was lucky to have been able to reclaim his wife—plenty of marriages would fail if the wife strayed. Lowego had kept the communication going, and things had turned out okay so far.

Stepping off the train for the final walk back to the apartment building, Hugo thought to himself that if Madeleine suddenly came out and revealed she'd had an affair, he would understand and even find it faintly exciting. Did that make him weird?

At home with more than an hour to kill before Madeleine returned home, he quickly came to the decision not to tell her he'd actually made it home early. No—he wanted to surprise her. He wanted to see her warming herself up for him in bed, and perhaps wind her up so badly that she was crying out for him to be at home already, she couldn't wait for him to commute all the way back from work. Then he'd show up, surprise her, and take her over the edge.

He made a space for himself in the closet, and made it comfortable with a few strategic cushions, then he checked to ensure he'd be able to see everything—and that from outside the closet, she wouldn't be able to see him.

He made himself a ham and cheese sandwich and watched a little TV while eating it, knowing that he needed to keep his energy levels up, too.

When Madeleine finally texted him at a minute past six to tell him she was on the way home, he made sure there was no evidence in the entire apartment suggesting he was home, then made himself comfortable in that closet, easing the door closed sufficiently to hide himself while keeping the sight lines open.

Then he texted back:

> Hopefully I won't be too long at the office. So you got away with wearing no panties to work today?

She replied:

> A customer asked me to get a Jeffrey Deaver novel down from a topshelf, think he might have caught an eyeful.

Hugo laughed at that.

> Did you make the sale though?

> He said I gave him the wrong one, sent me back up the step-ladder. But then he bought five books.

He loved the thought of his wife up on a pedestal, fetching books from a top shelf. He replied:

> And that's where Amazon can't compete. Sexy shop assistants.

Then her text came back:

> Hurry home—this sexy shop assistant is so wet it's dripping down her leg.

With that, he felt the need to get things started. He tried to channel the spirit of a dominant male. What would he tell her if she was his to control?

He texted:

> I will. But now I want you to make a quick sandwich for yourself, and then go into the bedroom and remove your clothes.

She replied:

> Yes, sir.

He'd timed his last-minute preparations well, because it wasn't long at all before he heard the front door opened, and Madeleine was home. His heart started pounding inside his chest.

He could hear her voice, and it put him suddenly on edge. At first, he thought she must have rumbled him, she was calling for him. But she wasn't calling for him—she was talking to someone.

“Oh my God! Seriously?”

Then he had a heart-stopping moment where he suddenly suspected that she might have brought one of her friends from work home with her. Why not? She could have a little play time before her husband got home—as far as she was concerned, he was still at the office. He felt a hot flash in his chest—God, the power of it took him aback.

How embarrassing would it be if they found him skulking there in the closet, even if it was merely a friend with her and not a lover.

But a moment later, he felt certain she was talking too loudly to be anything other than talking on the phone.

“God, that’s so amazing! I can’t believe it.”

“Everything is going to be so cool now you’re in New York!”

Lucy. It had to be—she was talking to Lucy on the phone again. Was she still going to follow through with what he’d asked her via text?

He heard a clatter from the kitchen—Madeleine making a sandwich while she continued to chat to Lucy on the phone. Well, he had told her to make herself a sandwich. He heard her finish up making the sandwich, opening the fridge to replace the ham and cheese and grab a soda, and then a few moments later he heard the TV switched on.

His heart sank—maybe she’d quietly given up the idea of a little flirtatious game with her husband.

He could hear she was still talking to Lucy, but with the TV on and blaring away with one of her shows—Gossip Girl or Vampire Academy Diaries or something like that from the sounds of it—he couldn’t make out their conversation.

What now? Did he bail out of the closet and admit failure?

A few minutes later, his phone buzzed. That actually reminded him he needed to put it on completely silent, or else even the vibrate setting might give him away. A text message from Madeleine:

> Hey. Just got home, had my sandwich.

Hugo's heart bounced back up to full speed again—she wouldn't text him to tell him she'd had her sandwich unless she was following what he'd asked her. He heard the TV switched off—it had been a quick sandwich, that was for sure. He wasn't complaining.

He sent a text back saying:

> Okay, I'm on my way.

If he was just leaving the office, she would know she had half an hour or so before he'd arrive home. He heard her come through toward the bedroom, still apparently on the phone to Lucy. Her conversation was a little clearer now that the TV was off, and more so as she now came out into the bedroom.

“No—he was like that guy from CSI, you know? No, the original series, the Vegas one.”

Gossiping to Lucy about some guy she fancied, no doubt. It gave Hugo a warm tingle between his thighs—Madeleine really opened up to her best friend in a way she didn't even with her husband. It felt wrong to be there, listening—but then he hadn't intended to eavesdrop. She wasn't supposed to be chatting with her best friend right now—the deal was she was warming herself up for her husband.

God, she looked good in a light summer dress with a white, blue and green floral print that came down mid-thigh, and wasn't as short as she'd worn to work, but fitted tightly to her body to show off her curves. Had she really worn no panties to work that day?

“God, it was totally crazy. I mean, I guess I had a few drinks, but—”

He could hear Lucy's voice, though couldn't quite make out her words as Madeleine went to the windows and re-angled the blinds, giving herself privacy. Hugo felt himself stiffen further, not only from the sight of this goddess in front of him, but in the hope that she was adjusting the blinds to prepare for sex.

“Everything—I mean everything.”

He heard Lucy's blasphemy in response to that, but by then he was beyond surprise that Madeleine was telling someone else about their restaurant encounter with the piano player. He had to accept that she told Lucy everything.

"I don't know, I guess since I started teasing Connor a little through the window every now and then, and with what happened with Hugo..."

She'd been teasing Connor through the window? She hadn't talked about that. Hugo supposed he hadn't exactly asked her, either. She probably didn't even remember to tell him, she was getting to be such a sex goddess.

She turned back, to head through to the bathroom now. Saying, "This fantasy of Hugo's, what he's been telling me since our anniversary... I can't stop thinking about it now."

He felt the opportunity for showing himself to Madeleine, of giving her a legitimate surprise, was now over. In the bathroom, he heard the water running in the sink and wondered if he might be able to sneak past the door while she was in there.

"I'm going to put you on speaker, can't hold the phone while I..."

Hugo heard the familiar sound of Lucy's voice, though somewhat tinny from the phone's micro-speakers, echoing slightly because of the acoustics of the bathroom.

"You know Jilly Bennett wrote a piece about this last year in the Globe. It's the new in thing."

"The new in thing?"

"Husbands that let wives stray. The male fantasy always used to be two women, right? But we're just not wired that way. Watching our men screw another woman right in front of us."

"Of course not."

Hugo edged the closet door open, poked out his head. But the bathroom door was so wide, it was going to be a huge gamble that she was even facing away from the door when he scampered past. And there was the mirror above the sink—she could spot him in that.

“We’re just not biologically wired that way,” Lucy said. “Only, it turns out a lot of men are biologically wired to see their woman with another man.”

“A lot of men?”

“Oh, it’s quite common. But God, you’re so lucky.”

Hugo quietly pulled back, easing the closet door back into its mostly-closed position as quietly as possible. He’d have to come up with a different exit plan.

“A lot of men want their women to sleep with other men?”

“Jilly talked to a load of shrinks about it. It’s like the married male psyche has this in-built acceptance that women peak sexually at 40—but instead of having his wife threaten their relationship with affairs, he wants to know about and approve his wife’s sleeping around.”

“Seriously? How did I not hear about this when I was considering whether to get married?”

“Because you were considering whether to get married when you were, like, seven years old.”

Now Madeleine emerged from the bathroom, looking radiant.

“Oh, yeah. I did kinda know about Hugo by our second date,” she said. “So I still don’t understand it: these guys are happy for their wives to have affairs? They don’t get jealous and angry?”

Madeleine dropped her phone onto the bed, but then turned to perch on the chair by her dresser, as though to do her make-up. Make-up? Was she going out?

On speakerphone still, Lucy said: “Not angry. Jealous, maybe, but then this whole primal thing kicks in, and it makes them firstly see that their wife is more desirable because other men want them, and secondly want to fight for her and reclaim her as their own—so it makes them more sexually attracted to their wives.”

“Seriously.”

Madeleine was applying eye-liner. What was she doing that for? She never ordinarily put make-up on just for a little romance with her husband—not unless it was date night, and date night had been yesterday since she’d been worried her Saturday shift might tire her out today since there was a new Stephen King book coming in.

“And this is a lot of men?”

“A surprisingly significant proportion. Jesus—I thought Jilly was writing a fairy story. But you’ve God-Damned married one.”

“I guess...”

“God, I want one. Where can I find one?”

“You’ll have to put an ad in the personals: Wanted, husband who will let me cheat on him.”

“It’s not cheating if he knows about it. And if he approves—it’s like he’s in control, so.”

“And the husband doesn’t want to sleep with other women?”

“Not according to Jilly’s article. These are the kind of guys who idolize their wives. Just like Hugo does with you—I’ve seen that look in his eyes when he’s watching you.”

“When he’s watching me?”

“You know he went to some of your events without telling you?”

“He did what?”

“God, I really shouldn’t be telling you this.”

“You’re keeping secrets from me?”

“I’m his Maid of Honor too, honey buns.”

“I’m not sure that’s how it works.”

Now Madeleine was applying lipstick—bright, scarlet lipstick.

Lucy said: “Anyway, it’s sweet. You’ll love it. He wanted to see your big event—he’s seriously proud of you, by the way. But he worried you might feel the need to host him because he's your husband—he didn't want to take any of your attention away from your big day.”

“Seriously.”

“So he was watching you flirting with those coworkers of yours—and those authors of yours.”

“God—really? You could have told me...”

“I would have—but he had this dreamy expression on his face. Honestly, I thought he'd shared a spliff with one of those student admirers of yours. I even talked to him—he just said he was happy you were so happy. I never put two and two together...”

“He saw me. And he really did like it?”

“This is the real victory of feminism,” Lucy said. “Husbands that let us sleep around—and don't want to themselves. Only, according to Jilly's article, this was common enough way before feminism. So are you gonna do it?”

“Am I gonna do it?”

“Sleep with some other guy. God, I would. If my husband—if I had a husband—said he had a fantasy about another man fucking me, I would be out that door in a shot to look for another man.”

“You find it hard enough to find one man, Luce.”

“Details. I know what I'm looking for in a husband now, though.”

“You can't have Hugo, he's taken.”

“I couldn't have Hugo even if you let me—I've seen how he looks at you.”

“Really?”

“Really. So who's it going to be?”

“Who's it going to be?”

“Who's your first target? Fabian? Ryan? That Connor guy's always in the bookstore trying to pick you up.”

Madeleine stood up, peered into the mirror on the dresser as though seeing her make-up from a few inches away would reveal some imperfection that needed fixing. Hugo was finding it a little hard to breathe, these two women talking about his fantasy—talking about Madeleine fulfilling his fantasy. If he'd had a seat, he would have certainly been on the edge of it.

"I don't know," Madeleine said. "I mean, this is all very weird. I mean, I think I have to figure it out in my head."

Lucy said: "You do want to sleep with other men? I mean, who wouldn't?"

"I... I guess it would be nice, if it was the right guy."

Hugo felt his heart skip, a jolt of jealousy shooting through.

"Who are you kidding it would be nice?"

"Okay, it could be hot," Madeleine said, pouring boiling oil into her husband's stomach. "But I need to know about Hugo. I don't want to ever hurt him, and I don't want anything to ever come between us."

"Oh, it won't. That's the beauty."

Next up, a little hair brushing. She was brushing her hair for him?

"I need to know he's not doing this because he thinks it's the only way to make me happy. I need to know he wants this for him, not just for me."

"God I'm so jealous."

"Okay, I have to go, Luce," she said.

"You can't be going out again?" Lucy complained.

"Actually, no," Madeleine said, fondling her breasts a little before she reached back to unfasten the catch on her bra, and leave herself naked. "We're having a night in."

"Oh, okay. He's there with you now?"

"Uh... no. He's on his way. Only, he's told me to warm myself up for him."

"Told you to warm yourself up for him?"

"I don't know—seemed pretty forceful. I kinda liked it."

"Jesus I wish I had a husband telling me to get in his bed."

Hugo couldn't help but smile as he saw Madeleine laugh at her friend. His cheerfulness at the way she'd casually dropped in the part about warming herself up for him fueled his inner warmth.

"I never thought I'd hear you say that," she said.

"You have to tell me what happens."

"Okay—we'll see."

"Oh, hey—that personal trainer of yours at the gym. The one with the huge cock. You know he's interested—he'd be a nice first fling."

"Goodbye, Luce."

Nine

Madeleine looked insanely good with her face highlighted by startling lipstick, dark eyeliner and mascara. And the way that dress held her curves was a thrill in itself. For a moment or two she gazed down at the bed in front of her, as though wondering where she wanted her husband to find her when he returned home.

She drifted over toward the windows, resting a knee on the window seat as she leaned forward to prize apart two of the slats, and peer out across the street.

Hugo felt his blood stirring as he realized who she must be looking for.

He glanced down at his cell phone. It had been twenty minutes—she'd be expecting him to arrive very shortly. How could he escape the closet?

He sent a text message:

> Almost home. You warming yourself up for me, honey?

He saw her twirling a strand or two of her hair as she glanced down at her cell phone, reading his message, then back up to the gap in the blind made by her fingers. Could she see her crush across the street? Could she see Connor?

She was tapping out a reply, he could see it.

> Just getting started. Phone call from Lucy—couldn't get rid of her.

Hugo couldn't think of how to get past her. Could he get her so turned on, so caught up by touching herself that he could sneak out? He didn't have any other answer—he felt the need to delay her, at least, distract her.

He texted her:

> Where are you, in the bedroom? Tell me what you're wearing.

She replied:

> Yeah, I'm in the bedroom, looking out the window. Wearing my blue and green dress I got at Macy's last week.

Hugo replied:

> Who do you see out the window? Connor?

Her reply:

> Yes, he's home. On his own, though.

> What's he doing?

> Lying on his bed, listening to music, I think. He has big headphones on.

Hugo suddenly remembered what she'd said to Lucy a earlier that evening: ever since I started teasing Connor a little through the window. Hugo felt he'd missed out on her telling him about that. Maybe it was time to see it for himself.

He sent a text stating firmly:

> I want you to pull up the blinds.

She replied:

> You want him to see me?

> Yes. Pull them up, now. I'll know if you don't.

He saw her pause, peering through the gap in the blind again. Something suggested to him that if Madeleine had teased Connor much through the windows, it hadn't involved much exposure on her part. She glanced down at her cell phone again, as though checking his text actually said what she thought it said.

Then she reached up for the cord hanging down beside the blind, and hauled it upward, opening the room up to the street to a startling extent.

It made Madeleine catch her breath. He saw her suddenly turn away, and for a moment thought she must have discovered his position, made him. But she wasn't looking at him, wasn't focusing on the closet or the gap between the doors. She had just turned her back on the street, on Connor, a dazed smile spreading on her face suggesting that he'd spotted her, knew she was there.

Hugo couldn't quite see out of the windows at the right angle to see Connor's apartment. He texted her:

> Does he see you? Does he know you're there?

She replied:

> Yes, he's seen me.

Hugo felt his stomach fluttering, his hardness bulging. Was he really thinking about getting his wife to strip in front of the windows when her crush was watching? He was.

He decided to give her a chance—and perhaps himself more of a chance to get out of there. He texted her:

> Turn out the lights.

She did—stepping back to kill the bedside lamp, and the ceiling light. It left her only in semi-darkness at most—the light from the street flooding through the enormous windows meant Connor would still be able to see her, Hugo suspected. He could see her well enough, though the colors were leached out.

He had to be careful to turn the brightness down on his cell phone screen to avoid alerting her to him.

Madeleine sat on the bed facing the windows, hunched over her phone.

He read her text:

> There's a lot of light from the street—he must be able to see me.

Hugo texted her back:

> Go back to the window.

He heard her quiet gasp at that, and saw her hesitate. Was she going to do what he asked? This thing would kind of fall apart if she didn't.

He saw her hunch over her phone briefly, then she send her message.

> Yes, sir.

She picked herself up, and made the two steps back to the window in a very leisurely fashion. Nervous.

> Is he watching?

> Yes, sir.

> Remove your dress.

He saw her standing there, shaking a little. Should he have ordered her to drink a glass or two of wine before doing this? Well, he didn't want to get her drunk, this wasn't about humiliating her, this was about turning her on.

She hesitated, and now Hugo was beginning to regret this approach. Was this frightening her? Would this put her off?

He was about to type out a text telling her it was okay, she didn't have to do this after all, perhaps she should close the blind again, play with herself under the bed sheets if she still felt like it.

But then he saw her step up to the window, knees nudging up against the edge of the window seat, and slip her dress off her shoulders, revealing the beautiful flowing shape of her back. She was still wearing a bra, white, simple, and now completely exposed.

She paused again. She might have been teasing Connor through the window for a while, but her delay now told Hugo she hadn't gone this far before, hadn't actually shown him anything. Hugo felt his heart rate quicken—was it wise encouraging his wife to strip in front of a man who had been flirting with her for ages, or, as Lucy had suggested, had been trying to pick her up? A hot young guy on whom Madeleine had developed a crush for months.

His reeling head and churning stomach suggested not—but the hardness between his legs said otherwise.

If she stripped in front of him now, would the guy take that as an invitation to keep going after her? He probably didn't need an invitation.

Hugo caught his breath as Madeleine pulled her wrists out of the dress, and then pushed it further down her body, slowly easing it over her hips and her gorgeous behind, revealing the crack between her sweet round cheeks—but not a hint of underwear.

She had been telling the truth when she'd said she hadn't worn any panties to work. Was she really going to do this?

She hesitated again with the dress half covering her behind, her hands sliding up to nervously clutch her waist before returning to finish the deed. Then Hugo caught a glimpse of the darkness between her legs before she turned, standing side-on to the window to allow the dress to fall past her thighs.

Her bared pussy was hidden from onlookers as she stooped briefly to push her dress over her knees and then stepped out of it.

She picked up her phone again from the window seat, and brushed her hair out of her face, tucking a strand behind her ear. She stood with her back to the windows, almost naked. Hugo could see the startling sight of her pubic hair nestled between her upper thighs. Was he really telling her to show it to him?

How much could Connor see? Hugo couldn't gauge the angle from the closet, couldn't even see Madeleine's crush. He saw a light in an apartment a couple floors above the student apartment switched off. Were there others watching Madeleine's display from across the street?

A text message came through to his phone:

> The dress is gone. What would you like me to do next?

That was it—no sarcastic 'I hope you're happy' addition, trying to stir up his irritation for doing this to her—just an innocent prompt for her master.

He replied:

> I assume you've been telling the truth about wearing no panties today. But now you should remove your bra.

In the semi-darkness, he saw her cell phone light up when his text message arrived. He also saw her quietly flinch as she laid eyes on it. But instead of typing in an instant refusal, she stooped briefly to drop her phone back on the window seat.

Her hands brushed over her hips and her waist, then swept up to fondle her cleavage, her last moment or two of indecision, making Hugo imagine she must be going through her own dilemma—whether to comply with her husband’s wishes, whether to do this for real.

She could easily have done none of this and simply texted sexy little white lies back to her husband to report that she was removing her clothes. But though Hugo knew the temptation was there, he also recognized the glint in Madeleine’s eye that said she was excited by this—beyond excited. And she saw the opportunity that now presented itself, to expose herself for the benefit of her crush, who she knew full well was interested in her—with the full knowledge and approval of her husband. What if the opportunity never came round again?

Decision made, she reached behind her back to release herself from her bra, flicking the catch, then slipping one shoulder strap and then the other over her shoulders. She held it over her breasts for a few moments, teasing herself with that final chance to stop all this, to cover herself back up, sight unseen.

Then she allowed her last remaining cover to fall to the floor.

> It’s done. Now I’m standing naked in front of the windows.

> Facing the windows?

> No, facing away.

> How do you feel?

> Scared. Excited.

> Is he watching you?

Hugo saw her glance over her shoulder, then utter a soft little gasp.

> He’s turned out his light, but I can see him sitting on his bed, watching me.

> I bet you’re turning him on. I bet you look incredible.

She looked over her shoulder again, and Hugo saw her gently rubbing her thighs together—she was turned on, no mistake.

Turning back to tap out another message in her phone.

> He's taken his headphones off, and he's taken his shirt and pants off. I can see him sitting there, there's enough street light.

Hugo wished he could know how much Connor could see—but he assumed he could see enough.

He texted back:

> If you can see him, chances are he can see you.

In the half light, he saw Madeleine smile at that, a wicked smile.

Hugo sent her another text:

> Turn around.

Another flinch—real shock on her face this time. But she was turned on now, she was really buzzing. Her flash of shock melted into mild disbelief and then warm arousal.

She turned her head to look at her admirer once more, her hand stroking herself from her neck all the way down her chest, over one breast and down her stomach as though to check whether she was actually naked.

Then she brushed her hair back out of her face, and gently tilted her hips before ease herself incredibly slowly around, twisting on her toes until she was presenting her rear to her husband once again—and her full frontal self to the street and her half-naked devotee.

The way she moved, nervously but slowly, it looked like some kind of dance, showing off her body to her audience as though she was an exotic entertainment for a sultan or maharaja. In the streetlight flowing through Madeleine's slightly-parted legs, Hugo could see her pussy lips beautifully defined for a tantalizing moment—and then she turned again, once again giving Connor only the rear view.

She stooped, grabbed her phone again.

> Are you nearly home? You're driving me crazy.

He smiled.

> I like driving you crazy. Is he still watching you? I'm nearly home.

He was so turned on—the light was just enough to show Hugo what his rival across the street had probably seen. It took his breath away.

> He's still watching me. I think he assumes I can't see him—he's sitting back against the headboard now, thinks he's safe.

> But you can see him?

> Can't see his face now. Could see him take off his briefs, though.

> He's naked?

> And hard.

Hugo trembled a little.

> You like looking at him? He's hard because of you.

> He has a nice cock. It makes me feel fizzy all over.

She was stroking her breasts, pinching her nipples, knowing she had two men hard at the thought of her.

> You better come home soon, or I'll have to call him over.

Hugo knew she was joking, but with the evolution of this fantasy between them—and her embracing of it—there was always that glimmer of a chance that she'd one day say to hell with it, let's do this. It kept him firmly and constantly on edge.

But he didn't feel quite ready just now, as tempting as it was to urge her to go for it, beckon the guy over.

> Walking back from the subway. Like the idea of calling him over, but on this occasion I need to be inside you, can't wait in a line.

She let out a little giggle at that.

> I'm so wet waiting for you. Hurry.

Still holding the phone, and this time unprompted, she turned back toward the window, and he could hear her sigh as she lifted a knee, slid forward on the window seat and now pressed her hands to the glass.

She was a goddess, a siren tempting men to their doom, the streetlight splashing a orange and blue cocktail over her smooth, bare skin as the eyes of her crush took in her beauty while her husband watched.

One hand still holding her phone as it supported her weight against the glass, Madeleine caressed her breasts, then Hugo saw her thigh tense, and she was lifting herself up to kneel in the window seat and then press her naked body against the glass.

God—any number of men would be able to see her shoved up against the window—Hugo was a little startled by her display. She was so shockingly naked—the world could see her breasts crushed against the glass, her bare midriff, those long smooth thighs—and her pussy glistening in its bare glory.

What a thrill to see her flaunt herself, though. That his wife could be driving any onlooker into a fervor, no doubt Connor among them. She breathed deeply, enough for him to hear, sounding as though she'd entered some kind of dream state.

Silently, he drew open the closet, and stepped out into the bedroom. His heart was thumping as though trying to wake the dead. He stole two, three paces around the bed, until he was by the door and able to give her the impression he'd just got in. Sure, it was wrong to lie to her, but maybe he wouldn't need to say anything about being there all night, seeing her.

"Is he still watching?" he asked her, and smiled as he saw her jump.

"Of course," she said, and he could see her face reflected in the glass, see her smile, and the unbridled joy it revealed made him feel unbelievably content. "He's stroking himself while he looks at me."

"I think he's probably seen enough for now," Hugo said, channeling his inner alpha male. "You're mine now. Close the blind."

She seemed to shiver at the knowledge that her man had come to reclaim her. Then she reached for the cord, and let down the blind, angling it so it continued to let in a little light from the street in the familiar washboard pattern, though eyes on the other side of the street would be denied.

“Don’t hurt me sir,” she said, and Hugo would have smiled at her put-on plaintive tone if he wasn’t so keyed up with desire. “I didn’t know I was being watched, I didn’t know there was another man hiding across the street.”

“Get on the bed,” he growled. “On your knees.”

She had a strange spark in her eyes, and for a split second a wicked smile flashed across her face before she hid it behind a respectful facade and moved to the bed. She wanted him, badly.

He let her wait, one minute, two minutes. Poised on her hands and knees, a goddess on all fours.

“Did you enjoy your little show?” he asked her.

“Yes, sir,” she said, putting on a meek little voice.

“You enjoyed showing yourself to him?”

“Yes.”

Ridding himself of his underwear, Hugo climbed onto the bed, awestruck by her beauty, her curves, her raw sexuality.

“You ever been that far before when you were teasing him through the windows?”

“No, never.”

He urged her down, and she took his instruction, pushing herself flat against the bed, though tilting her hips up, parting her thighs slightly as he zoomed in on her, brushing his face against the back of her thighs before he came down to nudge up against her dripping pussy.

“You used to touch yourself while you watched him,” he said, breathing in that wicked scent, that spice of female arousal of which he could never get enough.

“He couldn’t see from the angle, and the way I had the blinds,” she said.

Hugo pressed into the hot flesh of her body, his face wedged between her thighs and her buttocks, running his tongue along the slippery groove of her pussy.

He moaned, and she shivered from the vibration of his voice against her sensitive flesh as he hungrily devoured her, his hands gripping the front of her thighs to pull her to his mouth.

“Oh my God...”

Madeleine let out a shrill moan as he ate her forcefully, taking what he wanted, thinking about how she’d gone to work without underwear that whole day, how she must have felt working among her co-workers knowing she had only that dress to cover her.

He massaged her behind as he feasted on her tangy juices, making her whimper softly as he sucked on her pussy lips, teasing them with his tongue.

After an appetizer came the entree. Hugo pulled himself up, straddling the back of her thighs, then rested his big hard cock against her behind, nestling it between her cheeks, feeling her heat around it and loving the velvet softness of her skin against it as he stroked her.

“Did it turn you on, knowing that he was watching you take off your clothes?” he asked her.

“Yes, sir,” she said softly, biting her lip as he used the tip of his cock to stroke her soaking pussy.

“You liked watching him pull out his cock while he watched you?”

“Yes, sir. It made me all wet.”

He slapped her behind playfully, though with a clear crack. “I thought you said I made you all wet.”

“You did, you made me strip for him.”

Hugo prized apart her cheeks and angled his cock down, then pushed forward suddenly, penetrating her, filling her, reclaiming her as his own. She gasped at his forceful entrance, but groaned, dipping her head as he gripped her buttocks and began to thrust into her, gliding easily because of copious moisture, despite the fact that her thighs were locked together by his.

“You’re such a bad girl,” he said. “I know you were thinking about fucking him.”

“Yes sir.”

She was reaching forward now, her hands clutching the edge of the mattress in front of her as he rammed into her, her body shuddering with every entrance. He was breathing hard, every intake marked by the scent of her sex and her perfume as he squeezed inside her, her hot pussy gripping him tightly, quivering around him.

“You think I stack up to him?” he asked her.

“Oh, yes,” she said, her answer blending into a series of moans as he pushed her thighs apart now, lifted her behind up to drive into her from an angle that shoved his cock right against her g-spot.

“You’re curious about what his cock would feel like inside you, aren’t you?”

“A little.”

“You can’t stop thinking about what it would be like. Actually taking that step, actually dating another man.”

She groaned, said: “I don’t need anyone except you.”

He pushed hard inside her.

“Yes,” she said in a loud whisper.

“What was that? Tell me.”

“I want to see what it would be like.”

He was pounding her so hard now, both of them panting with every thrust.

“You want to see what what would be like?”

She was silent for a moment or two, just dealing with the powerful sensations of his alpha male treatment, his surprisingly athletic performance as he fucked her into the bed, her face shoved roughly into the pillows as he pierced her.

“I want to see what it would be like dating him,” she said. Then, a beat, and she added: “I want to see what it would be like fucking him.”

That admission sent her over the edge, and she was shaking, seizing up, and there was no way Hugo could hold himself back from the tide, her pussy clamping him so tight, drawing out his own orgasm and his come, sending an impassion through his body as his big hard cock erupted deep inside her.

Ten

After another busy week, which included one trip out of town for Hugo, though not an overnight, and another interactive author event for Madeleine, they were both looking forward to their next Date Night on the Saturday evening, both needing to unwind.

They'd started to take turns arranging their dates, which might have been anything from an evening at a bar, a restaurant, a nightclub, a karaoke club or some kind of activity like a picnic in a park, a movie or show.

This time, it was Madeleine's turn to arrange the date, and he had to hand it to her, her dates were usually more creative, so on Saturday morning he had a nice feeling that a little surprise was approaching.

During the day, Madeleine had a weekend shift at the bookstore, leaving her husband to sleep late and enjoy a lazy day in front of the college football. When she was supposed to come home after her shift, however, there was no sign of her.

The first thing he feared was that they'd got her to carry on, and do the evening shift as well. That would hardly be fair—she couldn't do two shifts in a row, not the way she worked.

About half an hour after her normal return after a daytime Saturday shift, Hugo received a text message from a number he did not recognize.

He started out reading it with the assumption it was from Madeleine, that maybe her phone battery had died and she'd borrowed someone else's cell. But halfway through the short message, his warm glow evaporated, leaving him in confusion.

> Hey! Nearly ready for our date. Been looking forward to it ever since you asked me out. Lets meet in the bar at the W, and go from there. You did say I could book a room under your name?

Was this from Madeleine? Sometimes people sent text messages to the wrong number. The fact she was talking about a date did fit with Hugo's expectations, but the bit about asking her out...

Hugo was left scratching his head.

He decided to brush over that little snippet, take it on face value that she was simply using someone else's phone at the store to arrange their rendezvous at the W hotel, presumably the one on Times Square.

Had she actually booked a room for the night? Expensive option for a date night, but Hugo approved of that idea. There was something seriously hot about the thought of a night of indulgence with Madeleine in a place like that.

He texted her back:

> Sounds good. What time do you want to meet there?

A simple enough reply—he wasn't going to ask her what she had meant in her first text message, and at this stage he wasn't going to ask whose phone she was using. Perhaps after a glass of wine or two, he might ask her to explain.

Then she replied with a text that sent a jolt of powerful confused heat through his chest:

> How about eight o'clock? Too late a start? Just have to blow off my husband—guess I was supposed to do something with him tonight, but I'm sure I can cancel that easily enough.

Hugo felt his cheeks burning, his heart palpitating.

Had she sent her text messages to the wrong number? Did she actually have another guy that she'd agreed to date? Had she finally given in to temptation to ask Connor out? Was she pursuing Fabian again? Was there someone else who had successfully negotiated her defenses?

He felt suddenly very cold, very small. Well, he had encouraged her to think about other men. He had told her how hot the thought was to him—the suggestion had been clear that as far as he was concerned, he wanted his wife to try dating other guys.

And now, she was. It just seemed so shocking that she would do it like this—without telling him. Perhaps even trying to use someone else's phone to conceal herself.

In his fantasy, Hugo had assumed if she finally agreed to try it, she would keep him fully informed leading up to, and after, a date with someone else. Knowing about it, about how it made her feel, about everything she experienced—that was the whole point of this. If he didn't know about it, it was simply an affair.

He tried to calm down. Madeleine would never be stupid enough to send a text to the wrong number, would she? Especially one like this. She had to be doing it on purpose. It was a game, to make him think she was having a date with another man.

Role play, it had to be.

He texted back:

> That's fine. See you there—looking forward to it!

He half expected the next text to be some awful apology, that she'd meant her texts for someone else. He felt his insides squirming around. If she did that, it would at least make things honest again between them. But it would confirm that she'd actually accepted someone's request for a date. Though half of him badly wanted that situation to happen one day, the rest of him didn't feel entirely ready for that entire shocking scenario.

Her final text was no apology.

> Fantastic! See you then, can't wait to see you xx

Kiss, kiss indeed.

He sat still for a moment or two.

He looked at the clock. Plenty of time to get showered and off to the W. If she had a date planned with some hunky other guy, he wouldn't be showing up, judging by the misdirected text messages. Hugo could turn up instead, and demand to know what the bejesus was going on.

Oh, he'd be forgiving, he'd even probably tell her he was actually happy for her to start dating—but he would make the firm demand for her to tell him everything if she did. Maybe she'd be angry about that, maybe she'd say it would spoil the fun for her—but if that was the case, he wasn't sure he wanted any of it—even with the strong urge inside him to know she was experiencing that wicked thrill of being with a new man.

If this was all a clever little role-play Madeleine had contrived for their Date Night, well, she'd be expecting him to turn up. He seriously hoped that was the case.

He hauled himself up off the edge of the sofa. One way or the other, he had to get down to that hotel. For either a date or a confrontation, either way, he needed a shower and a set of smart clothes.

He was about to get up and head for the bathroom when their landline phone rang. It startled him a little, since they so rarely received calls to that phone, particularly since it was unlisted.

He dived for it, said with a hint of uncertainty: "Hello?"

"Oh hey, sweetie." It was Madeleine. Hugo felt his stomach twinge.

"Hey honey, what's up?" he asked, neutrally.

She sighed. "They had me working a little late at the store—the new JK Rowling detective novel came in today, so the demand was crazy."

"Oh, right."

Another sigh. "Look, I know we've been really looking forward to Date Night, but I just had a call from Lucy and she's really messed up right now—she found out that Greg's going out with some other girl now, so—"

"Oh. Well they did split up." Heart pounding in his throat, Hugo found himself pretending to engage with her lie, not really knowing what else to say.

What was she doing? Really blowing him off?

“You know how she gets—and she’s sitting in a brand new, virtually empty apartment. I said I’d go over there, maybe stay the night—that okay?”

Still, he could not work out whether this was part of a role-play idea, or whether he actually had an adulterous—or soon-to-be adulterous—wife on his hands. Why was he so hard as he spoke to her, hands trembling so much it was difficult to hold the phone up to his ear?

This was exciting to him, unnerving and breathtaking like that moment a roller coaster car climbs to the top of the first high peak at the start of the ride.

“Uh... sure, honey. We can do Date Night another time. I guess... it’s been a pretty busy week anyway, we’re both probably tired.”

“You’re the best,” she said. “I promise I’ll make it up to you.”

He suddenly thought about the last time she’d missed a planned date night—their anniversary. And how she’d made up for that. That had been no role play. She had actually shown that piano player her bare pussy.

What if this were real, right now?

“Honey—you called on the landline?” he asked her, the first time signaling that something was strange about all this.

“My phone battery died, had to use Ryan’s,” she said, then gave a little chuckle. “You know, you’ve had that cell number ever since I’ve known you, but I don’t know it off by heart? But because I set up the phone in the apartment, that number’s lodged in my head.”

“Funny.”

Hugo thinking she could have tried to remember the number her new date had given her, and what came out of her head had actually been her husband’s cell number. Was that likely?

Madeleine’s call to the landline seemed to back up the text message that stated her need to blow off her husband—it was one more piece of evidence against the theory that those texts had come from some unknown adulterous woman who'd gotten the phone number wrong.

He decided to let it lie. It seemed more exciting to him, now, that he get Madeleine off the line so he could ready himself for a taxi ride up to Times Square.

There were two possible outcomes of him showing up there, both of which he hoped might lead to a wild night in a luxury hotel room, the perfect situation for Date Night. But if he was late, and Madeleine assumed she'd been stood up by whoever it was she believed was turning up—that wasn't worth thinking about.

He threw caution to the wind and got a cab uptown. It wasn't that expensive. To step out onto the sidewalk in his crisp evening suit, and not feel the sweat and grime of a Subway journey, that made it worth it.

He decided that he had to trust her—she had to know what she was doing. If Madeleine was initiating an affair, then it was something she was exploring with a view to his confession that he harbored fantasies of her sleeping with other men. That meant when she was ready, she'd tell him the details.

This was Madeleine, after all—she did not have affairs. She'd come straight to him the moment her manager had even kissed her, for heaven's sake.

He could trust her.

As Times Square approached, he was already semi-hard in anticipation, almost forgot to pay the cab driver he was so anxious to put an end to the uncertainty.

The cab had dropped him off just down from the hotel, since he didn't want to wait 15 minutes just to drive one last block because of the insane number of people and cars around.

As he ducked around the corner just off Times Square itself, into W47th Street, he felt his phone vibrate in his jacket pocket—another text message. His heart skipped another beat. What did Madeleine have to say now? Had she realized she'd sent her text messages to the wrong phone before?

He paused outside the fairly innocuous entrance to the W hotel, and retrieved his phone.

It was a message from Lucy:

> Hey Hugo, thanks so much for letting me borrow your wife for the night! And I know it was supposed to be your date night and everything. Really appreciate it Luce xx

That stopped him in his tracks.

What on Earth did it mean? That Madeleine had actually gone over to Lucy's new place in Brooklyn to help pull her back from the edge? That had all been hot air, though, hadn't it? Part of her cover story.

Hugo felt a little foolish, standing out on the street in front of a luxury hotel he may not have had any call to be outside.

Either this was Madeleine cementing her cover story for her husband, and therefore she had merely sent those texts to the wrong phone by mistake—or else her arranging of an evening's role-play was more complex than he'd appreciated. Lucy would have to be in on the truth either way—either if Madeleine was intending to meet her husband right now, or some other man.

Of course, there was also the possibility that Madeleine had been telling the entire truth—that she'd had to cancel because Lucy was feeling so awful. That the texts were completely unrelated. That Hugo was standing outside a hotel with no reason for being there at all.

But it was too much coincidence that Madeleine's phone happened to have run out of batteries, and she'd had to call him via the landline. Hugo felt his loins stir. Adulterous or not, he now felt a strong craving for his Madeleine to be up there in the W bar, waiting for a man to come sweep her off her feet.

He took a deep breath and stepped inside the gloom, and headed past the dual water features toward the elevator that would take him to the hotel lobby on the seventh floor.

If he'd been stupid, and unfortunate, he figured the worst thing that could happen would be getting to the bar to find no one in there that he recognized. He wouldn't have to tell Madeleine or Lucy that he'd been idiot enough to come all the way to the W to assuage his curiosity about that mystery text message.

As the elevator doors opened on the seventh floor, however, his swollen manhood was telling him quite clearly that Madeleine would be there, for good or ill.

Eleven

Madeleine and Hugo had stayed at the W once on the Globe's dime, a few years back, before Hugo had even popped the question.

The decor inside was somewhat different this time, but the atmosphere was similar, and the effect took him right back to those heady days when they were still merely boyfriend-and-girlfriend, feeling invincible with no hint that the dying newspaper industry would cast them out.

As he hovered at reception, trying to work out a strategy, he hoped this connection might have been a reason why Madeleine would set her role play adventure right here.

If, on the other hand, she was here to meet another man, she could have selected this place merely because it was a luxury hotel that she knew, and might make her feel most comfortable for the nervous step of actually breaking her marriage vows.

Safely obscured in among a crowd of tourists, Hugo considered—and then rejected—the idea of going up to reception to ask if they had a room booked under Madeleine's name.

What if she wasn't even using her real name?

He knew it was only a mental delaying tactic. He was tiptoeing around the edge of a deep, icy pool he was supposed to just jump straight into. There was going to be no shock-free way into that cold, cold water.

Quietly, keeping to the shadows—profuse in that hotel, with its dark nightclub feel designed for a young, trendy clientele—he ventured toward the bar.

Even as he approached the entrance, he could just about see a young blonde woman perched on a stool at the bar, wearing a dress that looked painted on.

Hugo caught his breath.

From behind, he could not completely confirm her identity, though his nerves were jangling enough that he felt confident it was her.

Madeleine was here, waiting in the bar.

But who was she waiting for?

Hugo felt his insides burning, his pulse racing, his loins tingling. He turned, checking to see if anyone else was approaching the bar at that moment—or if anyone had spotted his curious behavior hovering outside the entrance to the bar. It looked as though he was safe.

What to do next? He'd ascertained that Madeleine's story about sleeping over with Lucy was false—and ergo, that Lucy was in on whatever little game Madeleine was playing.

The bar was surprisingly empty for a Saturday night. When they'd been here before, it had been mid-week, and very lively. Perhaps it just wasn't cool to go out on a Saturday night when you were the kind of person who might frequent a hotel like this, or else it was too early in the evening. There were some people around—mostly seeming to be tourists, probably Midwesterners with their checked shirts tucked tidily into pale jeans, big sneakers adorning their feet, all wide-eyed over the amazing sights inside and outside this place. In fact, if anything, considering the other patrons, Madeleine looked out of place here.

God, she looked good.

It took him a moment to work up the courage to go over there. His fevered brain just kept wanting to consider the options—but there was really only one available. Walk confidently over there.

If she was there to meet him, he'd instantly show that he was up for whatever role-play situation she envisaged. If she wasn't there to meet him, and it was to be confrontation at the bar, then he would do best appearing strong, assured.

Hugo took a deep breath and made a beeline for the bar and for Madeleine.

She'd been nervously watching the entrance for however long she'd been waiting—that much was clear to him as he approached, and saw that flick of her eyes toward him, at first not registering the recognizable sight of her husband, then on the second, she saw him.

And what was her reaction? A slight start, perhaps. Either as she attempted to hide her shock that it was her husband strolling through that entrance, and not her intended date, or perhaps because she hadn't expected to see him in a suit.

“Hey,” she said, hopping off the stool to greet him.

Hugo's semi-hard cock twitched in his pants. It wasn't going to be semi-hard for long. She was wearing a black satiny dress that seemed molded to her skin, held over her shoulders by the thinnest of straps, the neckline plunging so deep that more than half of her breasts appeared visible, her nipples only just covered, yet prominent as they pushed against the thin satin material.

Her cleavage was heart-stopping in that dress. Hugo was willing to bet that any man who'd come near her that evening, while she was in this dress, would have found it hard to direct his eyes anywhere other than that shapely valley between her breasts.

Off the stool, he saw that the dress only just made it far enough down her legs to cover her behind and conceal her panties from his gaze. Her legs looked fantastic in the nylons that made him just want to sink to his knees and wrap her thighs around his head.

“You made it,” she said, and he took a deep lungful of her floral perfume—a different scent to any that she usually wore—before she kissed him softly on both cheeks.

“Sorry I'm a little late,” he said, as though he was definitely supposed to be there.

“Oh, it’s no problem,” she said, and the fact that she wasn’t either explaining why she wasn’t currently at Lucy’s apartment, or asking him how come he was here actually made Hugo feel a little better.

She smiled, running her eyes up and down him, taking in the smart suit, open-neck shirt. Then she said: “Actually it gave me just enough time to come up with an excuse for my husband, and persuade my best friend to help cover for me.”

Hugo nodded slowly. “Your husband...” he said, proceeding with caution, not entirely certain that Madeleine wasn’t merely making a little joke. “Does he have any idea you’re doing this?”

She shook her head, then perched back on her stool, showing him even more of her thighs. She nodded over to the bartender, who drifted over to top up her gin and tonic, and fetch a Bourbon and coke for Hugo.

“You know,” she said, “he actually has this fantasy of me dating another guy. Other guys, actually. He doesn’t seem too fussy.”

“Right,” Hugo smiled, feeling his ears burning, his heart fluttering as she talked about him in the third person.

She said, “We only talked about it recently. Funny thing is, I was already feeling this need to be a little more... you know... flirtatious with other guys. I’d forgotten how good it makes a girl feel.”

The bartender placed Hugo’s drink before him on the bar. He attempted to portray a picture of cool sophistication as he picked it up, focused on minimizing the tremor in his hand. But he badly needed the alcohol. It was everything he could do to stop himself simply throwing it down his throat.

“So why don’t you just tell him you’re here tonight, with me?”

She shrugged. “Seems a little insane, doesn’t it? Started out, I assumed he wanted me to go after some other guy because he was already cheating on me with someone else—or wanted to. Wanted to get rid of his guilt.”

“But he doesn’t want that, huh?”

“No, he doesn’t. I’ve come to see that—he’s just a voyeur. He gets off on watching, or even thinking about me in a sexual context.”

“Must be a good thing for a marriage.”

“I guess.”

“So you two are still... intimate?” Hugo found himself getting into the mindset of his character as dreamt up by Madeleine. But who did she want him to be?

“Oh yes,” she said. “Does that bother you?”

“Not at all. But you’re with me tonight, and you haven’t told him.”

She took a big sip of her drink, then looked him in the eye. “My husband might think he has a fantasy about me being with other guys, but I can’t risk our marriage. I have to see how he really feels about this kind of thing before I reveal to him that I’m in favor. Whether he actually can handle it.”

Hugo nodded. The words “reveal to him that I’m in favor” echoing and re-echoing around his head. God, that was both insanely exciting and the most terrifying thing he’d ever heard.

“So,” Hugo said, and he caught a hint of amusement in Madeleine’s eyes, that the role-play situation required him to act like his stranger character, not like her husband, in this startling situation. To stay in character, he had to conceal his emotions. “You’re going to sleep with another guy without telling him—so that you know for sure that he wants this?”

She shook her head. “So I know that I want this,” she said, now running the backs of her fingers down his thigh suggestively.

It was unsaid that this situation was about testing her husband, too. Because he wasn’t supposed to be here.

“Oh, I’m sure you’ll want this,” Hugo said. Play-acted alpha male confidence ran through his veins.

“You will go easy with me?” she smiled, her nerves showing through. “I’ve never done this before. Without my husband, I mean.”

“You could ring him right now, tell him what you’re doing. You think he’d tell you to stop?”

She shook her head. “No. He’d probably be a little hurt I lied to him, but I don’t think he’d want me to stop.”

“And you can’t resist the thrill of a situation like this anyway.”

“I guess not.”

Quietly, she was rubbing her thighs together, biting her lip. Getting into the fantasy of being with another man.

“I like that,” he said, sipping his drink. “That you can’t control that need inside you.”

“You do?”

“It’s a blazing fire that can’t be contained,” he smiled, but as they finished up the last sips of their drinks, and slipped off those bar stools heading for the exit, he wanted to do more than just smile. He wanted to shout, scream, run for the hills.

He wanted to take his wife to a dark corner, push up her dress and slide inside her.

She said, “Would you think me awful if I suggested we should go try contain it right now?”

Why was he nervous?

“I don’t normally do this on a first date,” she said. “Just so you know.”

He was shivering a little as they rode the elevator up to the 23rd floor, and the air-con wasn’t even that outrageous.

“But you are,” he replied. “So that shows that your rules have some flexibility.”

Even though it was now confirmed as a role-play situation, and he knew no one else would be making love to his wife that evening, Hugo was shaking so visibly he had to lean against the rail to make sure she didn't see it.

"I guess it shows I can be tempted if the right guy comes along."

She was nervous too, he saw. Twirling her hair, swallowing frequently. Madeleine was apparently good at acting, at really immersing herself in a role-play situation, losing herself.

As the floor numbers reached the end of the teens, Hugo realized what it was that was causing most of his anxiety: this wasn't just a fantasy situation, wasn't just fooling around on a Date Night, taking time out from reality to pretend they were something else. This was Madeleine preparing herself to embrace her husband's fantasy. This was Madeleine doing a final road test before actually sleeping with another man.

"Here we are," she said, as the elevator slowed to a silent stop, and the doors opened onto a fairly narrow little corridor flanked by a vintage-style black and white flock wallpaper, in keeping with the chic design of the rest of the hotel.

"After you," he said, and followed her out, and along to a room just a few yards down the small hallway. It wasn't a big building in terms of floor plan, the W hotel. Just very tall, at 587 feet. Hugo had looked it up after their first time, when they'd had a room on the 35th floor.

As he followed her, he couldn't help but run his eyes all over her. She looked so devastating in that dress. The way it sculpted her behind made him wince.

"You'll like the view," she said, slipping the room key into the slot at the door of room 2308.

"I like it already," he joked, provoking a slight smile from her, though being in character she managed to contain the kind of eye-roll her husband might be afforded with such a line.

The room was impressive. Relatively small, but cozy in its designer furniture and decor—and Madeleine was right, the view was knockout stuff. He supposed that with this tower, every room in the place had an impressive view.

“You don’t mind if I freshen up a little?” she said, and when he nodded, stepped into the bathroom, leaving him to wander over to the windows, to take in the scenery. They were high up, though perhaps only halfway up the entire building. The people scurrying down on the corner of Times Square he could see did look tiny. The little yellow cabs drifting by looked like toys.

Madeleine emerged from the bathroom having removed her pantyhose, and with the lust clearly in her eyes, Hugo suddenly wasn’t thinking about the view outside.

“You look unbelievable,” he said as they approached each other. She smiled, and he saw her shiver. “You’re cold?”

She shook her head. “Nervous, I guess.”

“We don’t have to do anything, if you don’t want.”

“No, I want to,” she slipped her hands under his jacket, feeling his body through his shirt, and then she was helping him remove the jacket. “It’s just a big step for me, you know?”

“Of course.”

“I’ve thought about it a lot, and with my husband telling me so frequently it’s okay to flirt with other guys, it’s okay if I want anything to happen—I guess I just couldn’t stop thinking about it. But honestly, I never thought it could ever actually happen in real life.”

Hugo said, “But now?”

She looked into his eyes, searching for answers still. “Now I think I’m ready to really try something, and it scares me.”

He wanted to step out of character, be her husband again, embrace her, comfort her, reassure her. Yet he felt almost a sense of duty to this carefully constructed masquerade to maintain his stance as the new date, the relative stranger.

“We can take it slow,” he said, trying his best to be reassuring.
“Stop whenever you want.”

Thinking, if she was with a real guy, a real date, that guy might not be so accommodating about her fears about her husband.

“Oh, I’m not sure I can go slow,” she giggled, now reaching to unbutton his shirt. “You know I’ve been eyeing you up for ages.”

Hugo smiled, but now found himself wondering who he was supposed to be in her little performance. Someone she knew? Had to be, if she was saying she’d been after him for ages.

“In the bookstore?” he asked, seeking any kind of clue.

“I guess,” she said, pulling his shirt off his shoulders, allowing it to fall to the floor. “But you know I can see you from the windows of our apartment.”

“And I can see you,” he said, feeling his hardness twitch in confirmation that he was supposed to be her crush in this scene, Connor.

She grinned, pushing him back onto the bed. “Not when I close the blinds.”

“No.”

Hugo felt a jab of sudden jealousy, even in this strange situation where she was imagining seducing Connor behind her husband’s back.

“I’ve seen more than that,” he said. “I think your blinds hide a lot less than you think they do.”

She nodded, the thought that Connor might have seen her masturbating in the window apparently left her unfazed. Perhaps she simply didn’t believe it. She said, “In that case you know you won’t be disappointed with anything here.”

He lay back on the bed, and Madeleine straddled him, embraced him, put one hand behind his head, the other clutching his ribs as she leaned in to kiss his mouth.

He tasted the sharp edge of gin on her lips and tongue, breathed in the sweet floral scent that had the most powerful effect of making him believe he was with another woman.

Wasn't he the one who should have worn a different scent for this scene?

Her dress rode up as she pressed her body down on him, feeling for herself how hard he was for her. She was wearing white thong panties, which really didn't seem like Madeleine's style to her husband. Not Boston Madeleine, anyway. Was this New York Madeleine, who was someone he felt he hardly knew? The tiny scrap of white hid little, but made big suggestions about the raw sexuality inside her.

He held her soft, round behind firmly in his hands, having encouraged her dress to ride up just a little more so that it was almost no more than a shirt.

"So your friend Lucy knows about us then," he said, and could have been talking as her husband as much as faux-Connor.

"It's not worth keeping secrets from Lucy, figures them out sooner or later."

"Right."

"She knew about my husband's fantasy about watching me flirt with other men before I ever told her about it."

"She did?"

"I guess she's squeezed a few secrets from my husband, huh? She always was the best at ferreting out a story."

Madeleine's golden hair flowed over his face, threatening to get in the way as she nibbled on his lips, slipped her tongue in his mouth. Then she was shaking it out of the way of her face to watch him as he forced his head down, his mouth finding one of her hard nipples through the material of her dress and the flimsiest white cotton bra.

More kisses, and she was smiling so broadly. That was the most beautiful thing of all, of course. For Hugo and his burgeoning obsession, that was the whole point.

“It was her idea, actually,” Madeleine said.

“Her idea to do this?”

“To tell my husband I was staying over with her, so I could see how far things might go with you.”

Hugo felt his manhood throb, and then when Madeleine pressed herself down on him, he guessed she’d felt it too through her little panties and his thin suit pants. The fact that her panties were already soaking wet also made him throb. God, she was dripping. Was this a particular fantasy for Madeleine? The illicit encounter?

He said, “So you’ll tell your husband about it eventually?”

She sat up, as though to apply more force still as she ground her sex down on his hardness, but took the opportunity to haul her dress up and over her breasts, then off over her head. Her bra followed soon after onto the floor.

“Of course. But I wanted to see what it was like first—you know, trying it.”

“Trying it.”

“I figured if I wasn’t comfortable doing this, I didn’t want to get his hopes up by telling him it’s definitely happening.”

Hugo didn’t care about the holes in her logic, not for now. He pulled her back down to him so he could suck on her breasts, take her irresistibly stiff nipples into his hot, wet mouth.

“Oh God...” she moaned as he moved over to tend to her other breast, breathing in that uncharacteristic scent as he did so.

He half wondered if she was tempting him to imagine another woman with that new perfume, if she still harbored doubts about his altruism, that he wanted her to sleep with other men, yet did not want to sleep with other women himself. From a neutral perspective, if you didn’t fully understand his voyeuristic interest in his wife, it was hard to understand the apparent imbalance in his fantasy. The thrill for him wasn't the hope that he could some day experience new pussy.

Nevertheless, it was nice to experience her in a different perfume, whatever her motivation. Perhaps it helped her step out of her normal character, and into that of an adulteress, which despite everything that had happened so far, was not her natural self.

Madeleine slowly kissed her way down his chest, his stomach, her hair flowing over him like silk. When she reached his belt, she lifted her head up to double-check its mechanism. Her hands went to his crotch, cupping him, tracing out the shape of his erection through the thin material of his pants.

"You'll have to forgive me if I'm a little... rusty," she said, looking up at him with a smile as she unfastened his buckle.

"Rusty?" That was the last word Hugo would have used to describe his wife considering everything that had happened recently.

"You know it's only been my husband the last five years. Well, eight, I suppose."

She peeled his pants down his thighs, just far enough to reveal his hard cock. The little gasp she uttered as she pulled it out, held it in her hands—that was impressive acting. It really made him think this is how she'd be with the real Connor—more so, perhaps. The guy was athletic—chiseled, in fact. He was a regular visitor to that gym of Madeleine's, after all.

"Compare well?" he asked her.

"It's gorgeous," she whispered, holding her face close enough to it that he could feel her warm breath, her fingers snaking around it to scope it out.

Then he felt her tongue, hot and wet, slowly dragged up his length, from base to tip.

"I love it," she grinned, bit her lip, then went back to licking it as though it were made of candy.

“I should date wives more often if they’re this easy to please,” he joked.

She gave a wry smile, then picked up the end of his cock, slipped it briefly into her mouth. “Probably should,” she said. “You’d find us all so desperate to try new cock, we’d do absolutely anything you wanted.”

She brushed her golden hair out of her face, then put his ‘new cock’ back inside her mouth, her lips stretching over his swollen manhood, working it, her fingers squeezing his base, pumping him.

Oh God, what would it be like to know she was doing this to another man? Rubbing his massive organ all over her pretty face, running her tongue all over it, tasting him, sucking him into her mouth.

Hugo nearly lost it just then. He was going to have to be careful.

As though she sensed him getting dangerously close to his peak, Madeleine withdrew him, licked his shaft once more time, then launched forwards, sandwiching his hot erection between both their bodies.

She reached up to kiss him, and he felt the wonderful smoothness of her belly as she dragged it over his shaft. She couldn’t resist further, however, pulling herself up so that her pussy rested on his rigid column, and leaving the thin saturated white cotton of her thong in place, he now rocked her hips to ride him, grazing her hot womanhood against his shaft, as he held her by the thighs.

“We don’t have to go any further, you know,” Hugo teased, trying to be in character. “We can keep it to this if you like.”

She circled her hand around it now, holding it up as she ground her sopping pussy against the base, making it look strangely as though she were wearing some kind of strap-on.

She smiled, loving the way his hands swept all over her body, taking in those glorious curves, her breasts, her hard nipples, her soft skin, gliding back down to her waist as she continued to shuffle her crotch over his cock.

“Oh, we’re going further,” she said. “I’ve been watching you through our windows—I know what you’re good at.”

“You do?” he smiled, and sat up to take her breasts into his mouth again.

Her hands slipped up to his face, held his cheeks as she kissed him again, sucking on his top lip.

Then she said, “Yes, I do.”

She pushed him back down, flat against the bed, so that she could slide up his body. Knowing what she was after he also slid down a little underneath her, so she could settle in a stable position, grazing her drenched panties over his mouth and nose.

Sitting over him, she pushed her sex gently down over his mouth, her hands covering his on her hip, locking them to her body to avoid distraction.

He breathed in her strong, dark aroma, and he very nearly lost control of himself for the second time that night.

“Your husband doesn’t do this for you?” he asked her, before opening his mouth to taste the damp cotton.

“Oh, he does now.”

“You’ve told him to?”

“He got the message. Inspired by our view across the street, you might say. I was surprised.”

Hugo nuzzled into her heat, and managed to push aside the saturated cotton to reveal her delectable pussy, wetter than he thought he’d ever seen it before. Her aroma was almost overwhelming, the concentrated spice of serious female arousal, while her tangy, zingy flavor only drove his hunger as he fed ravenously from her slippery folds.

“Oh Jesus...” she gasped.

He held her panties forcibly to the side now, his tongue dancing over her clit, quivering as it dipped into her hot slit. Madeleine seemed to let go of her inhibitions, oscillating her hips as she rode his mouth, her eyes closed. To Hugo, she really was imagining how Connor might treat her and he felt almost breathless from that knowledge.

“Oh God, oh fuck...” she sighed, and as he looked up he saw her wincing as though in pain.

“Oh fuck, that feels good...”

Biting her lip as though to cope with it all, as she continued to jink her hips to rub herself over him. Then she was shaking convulsively over his face, and though he didn't tend to believe in the myth of the squirting female, he did sense a profusion of her juices as she shook and juddered, gasping for breath as she came on his mouth.

“My God, that was just insane,” she said, pulling herself off him to remove the sopping scrap of white cotton still clinging to her body. “I've been dreaming about that for months...”

The thought of her hankering after Connor for so long, her secret insatiability, brought Hugo back up to full mast again.

When she lifted her knee over his chest and straddled him again, her dripping pussy was still over his face, but she now faced his feet, taking in the extent of his hardness for her.

He reached up and placed his hands on her round behind, squeezing her cheeks as he eased her down against his mouth, for another taste of her delicious nectar. It was harder to focus this time, as he felt her hot breath on his cock, then her tongue gliding over it, her mouth enveloping it in her wet heat.

He moaned, long and deep, and felt her respond to the vibrations from his mouth against her slippery, sensitive folds. Licking around her clit as she pumped and sucked on him, he teased her labia with his fingers, stretched her, dipped a digit or two inside her, marveling at her uncontrollable wetness.

It was a little much for her, perhaps, after her recent orgasm. She hopped off him, giggling, and almost wrapped her body around his head before kissing him from an angle Hugo had never kissed anyone before, almost upside down.

Tasting herself as she kissed him, as she nibbled on his lips, then full-out fucked his mouth with her tongue. Not squeamish at all about her flavor. There was something undeniably sexy about that.

When she crawled over him again, she wasn't stopping until she had his big hard cock between her legs.

"You have such a big cock," she purred. "My husband would be so jealous to find out."

"Jealous, or envious?" he chuckled.

"Probably jealous more than envious... but then he has a big enough cock as well," she laughed.

He reached down, and lifted his cock up to touch the searing heat of her flower, stroking her with his obscene hardness, coating his end in her copious juices. Madeleine moaned, and perhaps for a moment forgot where she was, what their scene was about.

Then she remembered. She was straddling a man who was not her husband. He was about to violate her, penetrate her with his fully erect cock for the first time, making it full, proper, cannot-be-denied adultery.

At least in their scene, anyway. And they had to keep to the fantasy, or else this wasn't a proper dress rehearsal.

Madeleine paused, and looked over her shoulder at him with a note of caution in her eyes. It was a difficult moment for her to keep in character—she gazed at him momentarily as though asking her husband for permission, wherever he was being kept.

But Hugo was not her husband in this scene, he was Connor.

If she ended up sleeping with someone else, and her husband wasn't in the room, there would not be any final power of veto.

Hugo said, "You okay? Want to stop?"

Perfectly light tone of voice, nonjudgmental, relaxed and reassuring—telling her it was okay if she wanted to step back, temporarily or completely.

She gave a nervous smile, and Hugo saw her getting back into the role, realizing she needed to work through this kind of scenario if she wanted to actually do this some day.

“You feel so good,” she said. “But I’ve never... not before... not while I’ve been with Hugo.”

Hearing his own name, treated in the third person, someone emphasized the fact that in this, he was not here—her husband was waiting at home, assuming that his wife was innocently hanging out with her best friend.

“Of course,” he said. “But we don’t have to do this now, if you don’t want. You want a break? We can chill out a little.”

She hesitated, then shook her head.

And she wiggled her behind, forcing his end inside her.

“Oh God...” she breathed, feeling just the tip inside her. Facing away from his head as she thought about what was happening—she could easily have been imagining it was Connor penetrating her, violating her wedding vows.

Then she eased down on his shaft, letting him take her weight, making him gasp at the tightness, the heat of her pussy.

Hugo moaned, as much from the thought of this momentous milestone—his wife taking another man’s cock inside her pussy for the first time as a married woman, even if it was simulated—as from the physical bliss of entering her.

“You’re so wet,” he said, trying to keep in character, trying to avoid saying he couldn’t remember when she’d been quite this wet before.

“Oh God, you fill me up so completely,” she breathed, for a moment just sitting there, still, feeling him inside her. Imagining being stretched by another man, but a cock she’d never felt before.

She leaned back a little, placing her hands behind her on his stomach to support herself, then slowly, as though unused to his size, she began to move, slowly rocking her hips back and forth, her stomach undulating as though she were belly dancing for some Arabian prince.

“You’re so big,” she said, “so hard...”

Leaning back further, her hands on the mattress either side of his shoulders, her golden hair sweeping down to brush his face, her movement on his cock accelerated, eased by her abundant wetness, so she was bouncing up and down on him, his hands holding her waist to support her.

“Fuck...”

He let her use him for a while, feeling a little startled at everything that was happening, at just how sexy his wife was in this game, in the way she was taking what she wanted, forgetting her inhibitions, emerging from the shy, downhearted girl afraid to even talk to her husband about sex—into this glorious goddess showing him exactly what she wanted.

Yet what she really wanted was another man right now. That was yet another dark thrill as Hugo lay there, dazzled by the beauty of his wife in the role of insatiable adulteress. He had to be Connor in this fantasy. He had to know how she would be with the other guy, what he could expect if she did actually go for it.

How did Connor make love?

He was young, chiseled, and unafraid to go after someone like Madeleine even while she was in the sanctity of her workplace. He wasn’t the type to simply lie back and let her take him, use him like some inanimate object.

Hugo grabbed a hold of Madeleine, pulling her to him in a powerful bear hug, piling his cock into her one last time before wrestling her onto her back. She squealed, apparently delighted, as he manhandled her, forced her down.

“My turn,” he said. “You’ve had enough time to get used to cheating on your husband.”

She caught her breath at the word cheating, though in their little game, it was a perfectly appropriate word to use for what she was up to—in her head, fucking a strange young man from the other side of the street, while her husband waited at home under the impression she was innocently cheering up her best friend.

Holding her down with one hand, he kissed her mouth hungrily, and held a strong hand down between her legs, forcing two fingers inside her, feeling how incredibly wet, how sensationally hot she was down there.

“You know how bad you are?” he said to her as he lifted off momentarily.

“Very bad?” she grinned, loving his new attitude.

“Cheating on your poor husband.”

“I’m sure he’d be happy to know I was doing this,” she said.

“But you’ve hidden this from him.”

“Maybe I’ll confess as soon as you’re gone.”

“Then it’ll be too late. He wouldn’t be able to stop you.”

“No. But I think that he likes having a naughty wife. So even if I am bad, once I tell him, I’d make him so horny, I’m sure he’d forgive me.”

He kissed the side of her neck, loving the softness of her warm skin, the gentle perfume she wore, the way she jostled her hips in response to his fingers as they squirmed inside her soaking pussy.

He pulled away from her, and as she looked up at him with her entire face a question mark, he reached for her hand, and pulled it up to his crotch, to the brutally hard cock waiting for her.

“Mmmm...” she said. “How is it that you’re using that thing on me instead of all the hot girls you always have running around your apartment?”

She stroked him slowly, her fingers closed around his shaft to form some kind of makeshift sheath. He dipped his fingers back between her legs, seeking out that heat again, coating his fingers in her juices before bringing them up to his face, breathing in her aroma, slipping his fingers inside his mouth to taste her again.

He said, “Because I’ve just found out how much better it is to fuck a beautiful woman looking to fool around on her husband.”

Madeleine lifted her head, craned her neck to reach him, put the tip of his cock inside her mouth.

She moaned at having him there, her lips stretching and curling into a broad grin even while wrapped around his girth.

Hugo channeled his inner Connor, and lifted his knee over her chest, carefully straddling her, the end of his manhood never leaving her lips. Then he was over her, the alpha male, letting her suck on him a little while, one hand caressing his thigh as the other gripped his shaft. He gently rocked back and then forward, gently fucking her face, though allowing her periodic breaks to recover from the massive object stretching her lips, so she could trail it around her face.

Hugo felt powerful, placing his hand in her hair as she closed her eyes and took him in her mouth, the other hand reaching behind to stroke her thigh and cup her mound. Fucking her face, gently but to his own rhythm.

His inner Connor wanted more. He pulled back, urged her over onto all fours, and then he was holding her beautifully round behind, parting her knees a little, placing the tip of his cock to her entrance and then easing inside her again.

“Oh Jesus...” she wailed as he thrust into her, his hands clasping her waist as she clung to a bunch of pillows as though to keep herself from being pounded into the wall.

She seemed to collapse into the bed as he pounded into her, taking his force, absorbing the energy of his powerful desire, adoring this different kind of lovemaking, that she didn’t normally see from her husband.

He was just about holding on as she now shivered and bucked under him, her eyes closed to imagine her new lover filling her, ready to blow inside her.

His body was zinging with electric energy and he felt the little jolts in the base of his swollen cock that spoke of the imminent arrival of his orgasm. Whether she felt him throb inside her, he wasn't sure, but Madeleine somehow sensed he was near, and now pulled away from him.

"You can't come inside me," she said. "I'm not sure my husband would be happy about that."

He nodded, then was a little surprised as she scootched between his legs, sliding down on her back. She sat up to grab his cock, pumping on him, forcing him to mark her with his seed.

Hugo felt his climax boiling up, and then he was coming, his white oil bursting forth to splash all over his wife's pretty face, her neck, her bounteous breasts and hard nipples. Dripping and dribbling down her smooth skin, Madeleine embraced his emissions. She rubbed his purple helmet all over her face, her cheeks, her chin, her jaw, her neck, even as he continued to spurt his cream over her..

Beautiful, messy Madeleine. Sticky with another man's come.

Hugo couldn't help but kiss her, thinking to hell with it, his lips sliding over hers, sucking on her, even with his syrupy fluid all over her, slick and salty.

"Oh God, that was amazing," she said, looking up at him, impressed at how he had surprised her with his sudden forcefulness.

He collapsed next to her on the bed, and they recovered their breath.

But breaths regained, Madeleine was telling him he would have to let her alone for a while—he would have to head off, head home. She could not spend the night with him, not this first time with him, this first time cheating on hubby.

Hugo, feeling his natural self returning, felt a little unsure about what she meant him to do. Would he actually leave the hotel, head home?

“I’m tired anyway,” she said. “I wouldn’t be any fun company tonight. We could do this another time.”

“Of course,” he said.

He pulled himself up from the bed, leaving her to swaddle herself in the bedding, drained of all energy. He pulled on his clothes, and left her apparently sleeping—feeling strange to be vacating that luxury room at such a late hour, fleeing in the night.

Twelve

He found himself leaving the hotel and it was the middle of the night. Feeling confused, dejected somehow, descending in the elevator to street level, walking out of the entrance lobby onto the street, feeling out into the hum of people on Times Square, his vision swamped by the chaos of neon jarring and flashing from every available building to call his attention to this Broadway musical or that consumer brand.

What was her plan? Was she going to spend the night by herself, thinking about what had just happened?

Should he just get in a cab and head home?

His loins throbbed gently from the contentment of recent use—God, what a wild Date Night she had engineered. She could have done it so much simpler, too, by just inviting her husband out to a hotel, telling him they were going to imagine he was another man. Instead, she had lulled him into the belief that she would be sleeping over with Lucy, that Date Night had been canceled—and then made him think she might actually have called up Connor for a secret encounter, only the text had gone astray.

Well, maybe Madeleine did need the rest of the evening to herself to think about everything, to catch up on her rest.

He walked around Times Square, marveling at the sights as though he was merely a tourist. The extraordinary panorama and the multitude of other late night revelers proved a distraction for five, maybe ten minutes before his mind started wandering back to that room in the W hotel.

What was she doing in there? What was she thinking about? Was she asleep already? Had she drifted off to dreams of being taken by her crush from across the street?

Or was she lying awake, making the decision to actually cross the line, the line they'd both been thinking about for so long now?

To sleep with a man who was not her husband.

He checked his phone at least every minute, perhaps even only ten seconds apart sometimes. There was nothing from Madeleine. Did he call her? Should he send her a text message to check she was okay? What if she was asleep, and he woke her up?

What did she expect him to do? Wait for her in the bar?

Fifteen minutes out, he decided she must have fallen asleep. He was a little disappointed she hadn't called or messaged him. He found himself missing her company, more than anything. This was supposed to be Date Night—their night to be together, to celebrate their rekindled passion, and more than anything spend time with each other, no distractions.

It had been an incredible experience, but God, he missed her. He'd left her mere minutes before, and now he missed her.

Was this going to be how he'd feel if she was out on a date with another man?

Eventually, he just hailed himself a taxi.

In the close confines of the cab, even with the smell of old leather seating and the incense or air freshener the driver appeared to like, Hugo kept catching the scent of sex on himself, the lingering evidence of their lovemaking.

It only took him until 23rd Street to figure he'd made the wrong decision. He shouldn't have left her—or at least, he should have stayed at the hotel, outside her door, down the hallway, down in the lobby, the bar, wherever. Even hanging out in Times Square, in the Starbucks across the street.

She could very well feel insecure after what they'd just imagined. Maybe she'd call him, any minute, in floods of tears and he'd be downtown, a taxi ride away. She'd think he'd fled the scene, perhaps angry that she'd booted him out, or that her act had been so true to the fantasy of her having an affair with her crush this time.

Past 14th Street he finally sent her a text. Simple, straight to the point.

> You okay?

His heart in his mouth, he hit the send button.

After that, he had to wait to see what she would say in reply. He tried to reassure himself by thinking he'd done everything he could to keep her happy—she hadn't told him what she wanted before he'd left, and certainly hadn't afterward.

At last, her text came back, and though it made his pulse accelerate a little, it wasn't initially helpful in determining what she expected of him.

> I'm fine, thanks. Had such a wonderful time. Disturbingly good, actually.

Staring at her message, he dwelled on the word 'disturbingly'. It made him think she was considering how genuinely hot the idea of sleeping with Connor was.

But what did she want him to do now? Continue his journey home? He sent another text, but still refrained from actually asking what she wanted. He didn't want her to feel pressured.

> I'm glad. You were so unbelievably hot tonight, can't stop thinking about you.

The wait for her reply was not quite so long this time.

> I can't stop thinking about you either. But I feel bad because even though he wanted this, I did it without my husband knowing.

Hugo was a little taken aback at this. She was still role-playing? Still imagining he was Connor?

He couldn't help smiling. She'd really gone for this theme of adultery that evening. It hadn't been anything they'd really talked about before—but now that Hugo had seen it for himself, there was something strangely attractive about the idea.

How could he possibly find the idea of Madeleine actually cheating on him attractive?

It was kind of sexy having a hot wife who got caught up in the whole temptation of another man, but couldn't find a way to break it to her husband. Hugo had always thought it would be a break of trust for Madeleine to go behind his back—but somehow, if he knew she wasn't doing it out of spite, out of any kind of malicious intent, but because she just wanted something for herself, to experience that thrill of the forbidden, the illicit encounter, somehow that wasn't so bad.

And if it really turned her on, the secret encounter, then it turned Hugo on, too.

He'd told her she could play around with other guys, after all. He'd made it clear that he wanted to know about it when it happened, but the important thing was he'd given her the green light to play around. So what, now, was the harm in her pursuing a little fantasy of cheating on her husband behind his back?

Hugo found himself thinking: if he ever discovered she'd cheated on him, well, not only would he have to forgive her based on the things he'd been telling her to do—he might even find it a thrill to find out.

Maybe he was going genuinely crazy.

Returning to his role as faux-Connor, Hugo texted her back:

> You don't have to tell your husband if you don't want to, you know. If you're not ready.

Back came her reply:

> I'm sorry, but he's too important to me. I can't really believe what I've just done. He said he wanted me to be with another guy, but his one condition was that I tell him.

Hugo was impressed that this central tenet of his fantasy had registered with her so firmly. He replied:

> Maybe your husband would be okay with not knowing right away, as long as you tell him eventually, when you're ready.

He thought she might read a little more into this statement than just that it was a line from her role-play boyfriend. It was kind of like a new policy statement from her husband, too. A new policy based on the realization that though they were sharing this fantasy of Madeleine sleeping with another man, Hugo's version was a little different from hers.

While he wanted to watch her taking full enjoyment of strange cock, perhaps her version of the fantasy focused on the forbidden part of an adulterous encounter. The secrecy, the independence, the game of keeping things away from hubby's eyes. She liked playing the naughty wife in more ways than just physical transgression of the wedding vows.

Jesus, the whole sexual fantasy thing seemed so fluid, so changeable.

Another text came through from Madeleine:

> Maybe. But this time, I have to tell him right now. Thanks for a lovely time, Connor. Have a good night xx

He replied simply:

> You too xx

That text exchange left him feeling slightly nervous, though he wasn't entirely sure why.

By the time the cab pulled into their familiar street, and he saw up ahead the entrance to their apartment building on one side of the street, and the entrance to Connor's apartment building on the other, Hugo felt a cold suspicion that he'd just given his wife permission to actually cheat on him.

Jesus, that was such a big step, so much bigger than merely the prospect that one day she might sleep with someone else with him watching. This new anxiety stemmed from a further loss of control—and yet he wasn't feeling he'd made a mistake. He didn't want to change his mind.

On the way up to the apartment, he reassured himself with the thought that if this didn't work, then they'd move on. It couldn't break their trust, could it, when he'd given her permission?

When he got back to the apartment, he sat himself down on the window seat to see the guy they'd Christened Mr. Portly playing around in his apartment with a little beagal-cross puppy. The guy seemed to have accepted the new addition to the household now, the cute little thing seemed to be house trained. The college students in the apartment above were currently out, so far as Hugo could see. For once. Connor's apartment was also dead to the world.

He wasn't really concentrating, his tired mind reeling a little from everything that had happened.

How long was he sitting there? Perhaps he even drifted off for a little while. He jerked awake to the sound of a key sliding into the lock of their front door, and the thing opening.

Madeleine.

“Hey!”

She was all smiles as came in, and he was instantly up on his feet, pulling her to him for a long slow kiss, swamping him in the clean scent of a recent shower. She'd changed out of her slutty evening wear, which somehow disappointed Hugo a little, though she looked lovely in a loose cream top and tight jeans. Her make-up had been reapplied after her shower, but subtly this time, almost trying to make it seem as though she wasn't wearing any.

“God that was amazing,” he said as they broke apart at last.

She was grinning like a minx. “It was, wasn’t it?”

“You should get some kind of acting award—I got the real feeling you thought you were with Connor in that hotel room.”

He could see she was wearing a black bra, her cleavage nicely on show with her low neckline, despite her attempt at a casual dressed-down appearance.

“I guess at times I found myself thinking it,” she said, her tone half-apologetic, as though she was going to get in trouble for fantasizing about another man.

Hugo felt his manhood stirring at the thought that she might have lost herself that evening in her pretense of an adulterous affair with Connor.

She said, “You were pretty into it yourself, weren’t you?” And her hand had found its way to his loins, pressing against his growing hardness.

“I’ll say.”

“In fact, I’d even say you were getting off on the idea that it was actually Connor there making love to me.”

Madeleine quietly squealed as she felt his shaft throb at the ideas she was implanting in his head, and her pretty face broke out into another of her enormous smiles, her eyes glinting with the knowledge that she’d confirmed her husband was turned on by the idea of her sleeping with another man.

Hugo could only shrug, he could hardly deny it.

Madeleine laughed, and then pulled back from him, moving through to the bedroom in a clear hope that he would follow. She was lying on the bed as he got there, like some Middle Eastern harlot wanting to entice a Sheikh into bed.

“Would you really have done all that on a first date?” he asked her while moving up alongside her on the bed, his fingers finding their way up her leg, adoring her smooth skin, those irresistible curves.

A shrug herself. "I don't know. It would depend on how the date went, I guess."

He kissed her neck, breathing in the soft scent of her perfume—one of her regular fragrances this time, not a new one designed to dispense with normality. As he tasted her clean skin, he enjoyed the warmth of her body,

He tasted her clean skin as he enjoyed the warmth of her body, the sight of her exposed flesh.

"So how was it for you?" she asked him softly. "I assume it didn't put you off this whole fantasy of yours."

"It didn't," he said. "I love the idea of you starting dating again, maybe finding a guy who drive you so wild you have to get a hotel room, maybe even the first night."

She laughed. "You know it must be every married woman's dream to have a secret permission slip to go out and sleep with whoever she wants, guilt-free. And here you are telling me I'm living that dream."

"I like making your dreams come true," he smiled, and leaning over her shoulder, kissed her long and slow, sucking gently on her bottom lip, as she reached to stroke his cheek, and he cupped her breasts, his fingers teasing her stiff nipples.

"I just find myself thinking it's too good to be true - there'll come a point when you'll decide it was all a bad idea. But that hasn't happened yet."

"I don't see why it should," he said.

She lay back as he moved to slip the button on her hot pants, then haul them off over her hips and those smooth thighs, past her knees, calves and the little white socks covering her feet.

Then he was dropping her little pile of denim on the floor. Kissing his way up her legs, loving the feel of her skin on his face, the way her scent strengthened as he ventured up her thigh.

She was highly aroused again, he could tell. Her hips shifted awkwardly as his hand gently closed over the front of her panties, finding out just how wet she was.

“You were so hard when you were imagining me with him,” she said, becoming a little breathless.

“It was from the way you were responding to the idea.”

Tracing two fingers along the line of her pussy, which was covered by the soaking black cotton of her underwear, he kissed his way down her stomach.

Madeleine was impatient, slipping her thumbs into the waistband of her panties, urging him to take them from her.

“You were so wet,” he said, peeling her panties down over her thighs, her knees, her shins. And then he was kissing his way up her inner thigh, seeing extraordinarily wet she was again. “Much more than normal.”

“Did that make you feel bad? I think I’d get so jealous if you were responding that way to another woman. Even just the thought of her.”

He smiled, hovering over her dewy folds, sampling her bouquet like a connoisseur swirling red wine around his glass. “I didn’t feel bad. Jealous, sure, but not in a bad way.”

“Not in a bad way?”

She groaned as he began to nibble on her labia, loving how his senses were saturated by her flavor, her aroma, her sighs and moans, the heat and softness of her most intimate parts.

“It’s not a negative experience if you embrace it,” Hugo said. “I think to myself that this is all an experience I am giving you—even if it was Connor sleeping with you, it would still be something I have given you.”

She gasped as his tongue coursed through her pussy, and up to her clit. “Careful,” she said, then dropped a little joke. “I’m still a little sore from... from him...”

Her little joke made Hugo groan, feasting his eyes on the pink folds of her pussy and how puffy and red she was. Imagining that it was another man that made her this way made his heart jump a few beats.

She lay back and allowed him to take his fill of her sweet nectar, but not so long that he made her come again that way.

After a while, she was up on her hands and knees, presenting her delectable rear to him, allowing him to take her and drive his hard cock straight into her with the full animalistic power of his need to reclaim her—even from merely the idea of another man.

“Oh fuck...” she hissed, her breasts shaken with every thrust he took, her hair swaying, her well-used pussy squeezing him as he buried it inside her time after time.

Both of them panting, sweating, pulsating with wave upon wave of sexual energy as Hugo made her his. His huge erection was so slick with her juices that there couldn't be any way she was in pain, even if she'd been sore before.

She came harder than he'd ever seen before—harder than she'd ever seen before—all red-faced and straggly hair, beads of sweat mottling her brow, mascara running, breasts quivering, hips shuddering as she let out a great scream.

Then he was coming inside her, pitching himself forward, holding her tight, locking his twitching shaft deep within her as he finally let himself go, feeling his burning seed coursing through his full length before pumping out inside her.

Afterwards, it took a long, long time for their breathing to get back to anything that resembled normality.

He asked her, “So you think you'd want to do that for real some time? With Connor?”

“I might want to,” she said, then added: “But I'm not sure I actually could with Connor.”

“Not so keen on him any more?”

“Too keen, maybe,” she said, her words fanning the flames of exquisite jealousy inside him.

Thirteen

She already looked pretty hot coming in from work—all made up, wearing a pretty summer dress that showed a lot more of her thighs than she'd ever show back in Boston.

“It gets better?” he asked her, only half joking.

“You do want me to make an impression, don't you?”

“Of course. And you would in that.”

“Oh, you wait.”

She beckoned him to follow her through to the bathroom, and he was obedient like her pet, though his eyes were planted firmly on her shapely behind tucked into that dress as they went.

A small pile of black clothing lay on the counter beside the sink, making Hugo feel certain she'd planned this. Part of her build-up for a man who just adored to watch her.

Checking out her glorious curves in the mirror that made up the entire wall above the counter, she flashed Hugo a minx-like grin and dragged the dress up over her hips and waist to reveal a pair of pink lace underwear that her husband would ordinarily have taken to be a special ensemble for sex. Yet she was intending to wear something different tonight.

Hugo perched on the side of the bathtub as she peeled the dress off, up over her head.

Then off came her matching bra, and down came those panties to reveal the tidy patch of golden hair covering her mound. Hugo felt a little giddy to see it. How far was she going to go this evening? She knew where her husband stood, knew what his fantasy was now. She knew that if she really wanted it, she could go as far as she wanted—sleep with another man, if she desired—and he would be supportive.

Naked, she looked stunning. Any man would go some length for the chance to see her like this.

First item on the pile, black with straps hanging off it—she unfolded it and held it across her waist. A garter belt, something Hugo couldn't remember her ever owning before. She fastened it around her waist, then revolved it around her body to get it into the right position.

"You've been shopping," Hugo said, trying to sound casual, relaxed.

"You like it?" she smiled at him in the mirror.

"It's pretty wild."

He couldn't help but notice, as she turned to look at him for real, just how hard her nipples were. She was getting off on this, dressing up for her husband, dressing up for their night out.

Next, she slipped on a pair of black and emerald silk and lace panties, which went on over the garter belt, over the suspender straps dangling down to her thighs. Hugo knew from glimpses of pornography what that meant: easy to get them off without taking off her stockings and suspenders. Then, a bra to match her panties, binding in her breasts, slipping the straps over her shoulders, checking it was all in the perfect position for the evening.

"How are you feeling?" he asked her.

She smiled. "Nervous, I guess," she said, now turning toward him, leaning back against the counter, then hopping up to perch her behind on the edge, where she could shuffle in order to put on her stockings. She had to remove her shoes first, but then she was stretching out the thin nylon, balling it up before lifting her knee to roll it onto her foot, up her slender shin, over her knee and up most of her thigh. The other one followed. Hopping down to connect up the suspenders with the stockings.

Jesus. Hugo felt his insides on fire. Madeleine was wearing stockings and suspenders. Clothing designed for pretty much nothing but sex—and therefore so very sexy.

Would another man get to see her like this?

Hugo had never seen a real woman in actual stockings and suspenders before, he realized. It was so powerfully erotic, bringing up memories of 90s porn magazines he'd borrowed while a teenager. So very luxurious, decadent, and somehow completely, wonderfully immoral.

She checked herself out again in the mirror, turning to gauge every angle, and to Hugo she was disturbingly calm. Had she worn this kind of thing before? For someone else in her past?

Sure, he had those niggling questions as to why she'd never worn this kind of thing for him before, but he'd been together with her to know full well the answer: she'd always been far too self-conscious about her body to wear this kind of thing, whether or not she suspected it would be a turn-on for him. These days, though, her confidence was at incredible levels—and this outfit was full testament to that.

Different shoes this time, a larger heel. Not quite stilettos, since they were intending on dancing that night, but sexy all the same. When shoes hiked up a woman on her ankles, it forced her to stand in a way that pushed out her curves magnificently—the feminist's nightmare, perhaps, with insinuations it was purely for a man's benefit, but it really did emphasize her femininity, and those scintillating curves.

God, she looked incredible.

A final application of lipstick, a shake of her head and a ruffle of her hair, and she was a sultry vision of seduction. She could have been a high-class call girl, a model, a movie star. But she was his, and they were about to go show her off on the dance floor.

Her little black dress was back out in the bedroom, hanging in the closet right by the door, ready and primed for use. She had to wriggle to get it down her body, it was so tight. The hem came down to her upper thighs, only just below the level of her stockings. It was going to be easy to see those later on, when they were dancing. The neckline was so low it barely covered her bra, revealing more cleavage than Hugo saw most nights.

She was ready to go, and her husband was almost drooling, he was so openly gaping at her attire.

The word wow just didn't seem to cut it.

The fact that it was already late as they headed out the door seemed all kinds of bad. This wasn't when civilized couples went out, not when they'd been married five years.

As she climbed into the yellow cab in front of him, Madeleine merely raised her leg and Hugo could see that she was wearing stockings, rather than hose, her dress was so short. It made him involuntarily shiver to see, to think they were embarking on a journey that could, if things went the way they hoped, result in Madeleine exploring some serious boundaries.

He could tell that she was nervous, too. She trembled a little, but she was also talked more than usual.

"She's moving in on Wednesday—can you believe it?"

"That's fantastic."

"I can't believe it. It's going to be great—we can just hang out, like we used to. It's weird to think she'll be a student again."

Talking about Lucy was a great distraction for her, it seemed, though all the way to the club she was glancing up through the windshield at the road ahead, those eyes scouting for the signs they were getting close to their destination. Hugo could read the excitement and anxiety in her pretty face, the street lights flowing over her as they moved..

"I think she's ready to start dating again," she was saying. "She needs some distraction from Greg..."

“I’m sure she will when she’s ready.”

“Oh sure, when she’s ready. But I’m just saying. You need to keep your eye out for eligible bachelors, Mister. I’m not sure the bookstore crowd is quite the right type for her.”

“I guess.”

They pulled up at the street just down from the entrance. His hand was shaking a little as he handed the fare to the driver.

It was still too early for a line to build up outside the club. They were nodded inside by the bouncer, whose eyes strayed all over Madeleine, making Hugo feel a flicker of pride and exhilaration. She was absolutely gorgeous, and she was locking her arm in his.

A drink at the bar steadied their nerves. A strong drink, as it turned out, and Madeleine was ordering.

“Don’t normally come on a weekend.”

“Huh?”

“I’ve only ever come here after work,” she yelled over the pounding music, which was too loud for conversation even this early.

The place was actually filling up already, it didn’t have that empty atmosphere of a party yet to begin. The darkness obscured some of the place, but they could see down to the dance floor, and it had a fair number of people jostling for room.

“I think we timed it perfectly,” she said, or rather yelled, smiling away at the fact that the barman kept ogling her cleavage.

“We probably did,” Hugo clinked glasses with her, and sank a mouthful of fiery vodka.

For a moment or two, they drank, they looked in each other’s eyes, just smiling at each other, examining each other’s faces, assessing how this was really going for the other, without needing to speak.

Conversation by body language. Her eyes seeking reassurance in his—you’re sure you want to do this? You’re really interested in this? You can say ‘no’ any time, you can stop me, you can come pull me back, we can get out of here at a moment’s notice.

His eyes attempting to calm her, to complement her and to show firmly how thrilled he was they were playing this game together. Without speaking the words, showing her that he trusted her, he loved her beyond anything, and knew that she loved him.

This was just a little fun, that was all. Treading near the edge of a cliff, but with no intention of tipping over.

Finally, she drained her drink, and gave a final nod. Okay.

She leaned forward to kiss his cheek, giving him a chestful of her strong fragrance—something sexy, feminine. Chanel, perhaps, though Hugo wasn’t savvy enough to tell. Then she left for the restroom, and with a fresh drink in his hand, Hugo found himself a small table by the overhang, from where he could stare down at the assembled ranks on the dance floor.

He was shaking a little by the time he saw her emerge, a solitary figure quickly absorbed by the throng.

It looked almost as though she’d pulled her dress down a little, if that was possible, until Hugo realized that from his vantage point up above, it probably just gave him a better view down her cleavage than at ground level. Still, she looked stunning, and as she began to move to the beat, she only looked more and more so, the motion enhancing the elegance and the femininity of her curves.

Hugo could see various male eyes checking her out, even from those already apparently with someone else. It made him tremble. Felt like he was monitoring a beautiful lamb while wolves paced in the shadows, waiting for their moment to pounce.

Madeleine glanced up at her husband, checking on him, though she didn’t want to react in a way that let anyone know he was there. Hugo returned a warm smile, showing her he could see her, he was ready for her to have a little fun.

A youngish guy, maybe even younger than the college students who lived across their street, was the first with the confidence to approach her. Blond, lean though without the athleticism of Connor—handsome enough to raise a broad smile on Madeleine's pretty face.

His eyes were all over her as they danced, apart at first, the foot between them making it seem to Hugo that she was displaying herself to him, showing him what she had to offer. She cast a few glances up to where her husband was watching her, seeking that reassurance as the guy edged closer to her, until his hands were on her waist, and then she turned, to graze her behind against him.

Dancing in front of him, her back to him, she allowed his hands to run down her body, over those sumptuous curves, and Hugo felt a shiver course down his spine.

Jesus. This was so real. Actually seeing this guy with his hands all over her, even briefly over her breasts, though that made her turn and silently chide him.

What was he saying to her? Leaning in, murmuring into her ear, periodically making her smile or laugh or roll her eyes. Whatever his approach, by the end of the number Hugo suspected she was less than impressed with his chat-up lines. She dispatched him to the bar, perhaps to fetch them a drink, but by the time he'd returned, she was already dancing with someone else.

Three of them, all a few years younger, danced with her. As she did so, Hugo started noticing her focus shifting to another part of the club.

He craned his neck trying to locate where her glances were directed, and saw an older guy hovering by at the bar watching her, occasionally nodding or raising his glass at her, biding his time while she worked off her energy with these young suitors.

Hugo felt sparks of jealousy firing off inside him every time her eyes darted off to the side, to gauge the affect of her performance on this man, who had to be ten years older than her, dressing smart in a dark purple shirt of doubtless quality.

It seemed that her display was now for his eyes, not her husband's. When she pushed out her chest, or wiggled her rear, she'd look over to this new man, offering him a coy but flirtatious smile at how she was performing with this young guy who had no hope of bagging her.

When it came time to send her young partner away, the music melted into a slower number, and Hugo watched the older man dropping his drink, sensing his moment.

He approached her with confidence, Madeleine seeming delighted that he saw her as worthy. Hugo felt a strange buzz underneath the quiver of fear and jealousy as he watched her place her hand on his lower back, and then she was pressing herself to him, accepting his hands on her body.

One track segued into another, and Hugo watched them writhe slowly together, knowing that this guy had to feel the heat from Madeleine's body, the firm swell of her breasts against his chest. The lights seemed to dip down lower as the dance floor became fully packed, elevating the colored spots and lighting effects moving over the crowd, though making it a little harder for Hugo to observe from above.

By the third track of their dance, Hugo was down to glimpses of them each time a light flashed the right way. The man was pushed firmly against her by the crowd around them, as much as his desire for her, and Madeleine was nothing but enchanted by it.

God, it felt hard to breathe in there, too many people around him. Hugo focused on drawing in deep chestfuls of air, accented by hints of dry ice, sweat and cologne.

A flash of light, and there was a glimpse of him whispering sweet nothings in her ear.

Another flash of light, and there was Madeleine nodding, smiling, giggling, responding to him with those dangerously seductive eyes.

Another, and another, and each new flash of light brought a fresh gasp from Hugo, though his shock was balanced by the growing excitement that Madeleine was really turned on by this wicked dance.

Watching her, he felt so alive. Shaking with excitement and yet chilled by a real sense of vulnerability, a hint of doom keeping him seriously on edge as Madeleine moved with her partner, more at ease with him with every beat.

Another flash of light, and the older man was pressing his nose into Madeleine's neck, inhaling her scent.

A heart-stopping moment of darkness, and then another flash, and Hugo felt a jolt of shock stab through his chest at the sight of the man kissing her neck gently, tilting his head to touch his lips just under her jaw. Madeleine looking a little surprised, but accepting it, slanting her head so that he might continue.

Jesus. Jesus. Jesus.

Hugo felt a little sick, and yet at the same time elated.

It was more than a little confusing. He was terrified, to the bones, and yet rippling with excitement, his manhood rock hard in his pants. She was so beautiful with her new dance partner, so pretty and elegant and graceful, a long burst of lilac light showing her moving with him, beaming up at him, adoring the attention.

Hugo was so in love with his wife, of course he was going to take pleasure in her having fun, truly enjoying herself, revealing that spark of sheer exhilaration from this unbelievable adventure.

Then, for the first time in an absolute age, he saw her looking up at him, her eyes searching out the crowd for her husband, finding it as difficult to see him in the darkness as it was for him to see her. It warmed him by several degrees to see her looking for him, checking on him, acknowledging his part in this.

She looked a little frightened at not being able to see him, until a spot light sauntered along the balcony and there he was, in bright blazing stage light. Her smile on finally locating him very nearly outshone the that powerful spotlight.

Her beautiful eyes pierced his, interrogating him in a fraction of a second, determining how he was responding to her transgressions with an older gentleman.

Hugo offered her a broad smile, and she was laughing, ostensibly at something her dance partner had said, though in reality it was clearly in response to her devoted husband.

He was trembling as she was cast into darkness again, and then when a new flash arrived on her, and Hugo saw her in the man's arms, kissing his mouth, pressing up against him as she sucked on his lip, it felt as though his heart had stopped.

God in Heaven.

Then the light was gone again, and Hugo had to consciously focus to prevent himself from hyperventilating.

His phone buzzed on his hip—a text message from Madeleine, he knew it before he'd even retrieved the little thing.

Her words were instantly comforting and reassuring.

> You want to meet outside? I don't think I can take much more of this!

He sent a message back:

> Sure, it's been pretty intense!

A flash of light, and she was looking up at him, smiling warmly, lovingly. A last message:

> Give me a few minutes, really need to pee.

Hugo nodded, and was up on his feet for a leisurely saunter out through the crowd of people now making the place a little over-full. He needed fresh air. He could wait for her outside well enough.

The line waiting to get in was now down the block—insane. You couldn't get more people in that nightclub, it simply wasn't feasible. Hugo felt a little old, coming out early. Back in Boston, before they'd been married, they would probably have been in a line like this, waiting to get into another nightclub having warmed up elsewhere, with the intention of going on until the small hours, maybe even dawn. Now, though, he felt relief to get out of there, to breathe the clear air outside, which might be just as full of toxins from the traffic streaming by, but at least was cooler.

The clocked ticked on, five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen. He was regretting leaving the club—what if something bad had happened? He couldn't get back in now, and this wasn't the kind of place to give him a stamp on the back of the hand for easy re-admittance.

He told himself she was simply waiting in a line for a restroom stall—no doubt the nightclub's bathroom facilities were totally incapable for such a massive crowd. Yet his heart was racing, he felt that dark undercurrent of paranoia and jealousy clawing at the wonderment and excitement he'd been feeling at actually watching Madeleine stretch the limits of their relationship in the arms of another man.

What if he had misread her intentions in those text messages? What if she meant for him to meet her outside so she could ask his permission to go home with that other man? She hadn't said anything about going home.

As the time ticked on, he started to imagine her remaining on the dance floor with that guy, knowing her husband had scampered off to wait for her outside. He had visions of the guy leading her away from the crowd, into some dark corridor, some shadowy corner where they could enjoy a little semi-privacy.

Pushing her down to retrieve his hard cock and wrap her lips around it.

Hugo was getting more and more certain she'd changed her mind, decided that if they were going to try this, they should jump straight off at the deep end.

Fourteen

Then, there she was. Grinning ear-to-ear as she laid eyes on her husband, a note of apology in her eyes for taking too long.

“The line in the restroom was insane,” she was already saying by the time she reached him, though he was in the process of flagging down a cab.

He laughed off her delay, though it had actually pained him. As a cab finally pulled in for them, Hugo was even a touch confused to find himself disappointed, that she had come out when she had, that she hadn’t actually decided to pursue her older dance partner further. They hadn’t talked about it, so it might well have made him feel a burst of insecurity, but it was hot to think of Madeleine unable to control her insatiable desire, that burning torch of sexuality within her.

“God that was amazing,” she breathed as they settled and the cab pulled away from the curb. “Do you hate me? I got a little carried away.”

“No, it was wonderful,” Hugo said, and she was snuggling up against him, kissing him as she had kissed that man on the dance floor—so passionate, her tongue forcing its way into his mouth so he could taste the alcohol on her breath.

She was really on fire.

As she assaulted his mouth, he couldn’t help slide his available hand over her thigh, brushing over the nylon and up to the lace band at the top, his fingers splaying out to sample that strange texture, and the transition to her bare skin at the top of her thighs.

The effect so erotic. Society in general had designated thigh-high stockings as sexy, and Hugo could do nothing but respond to these on Madeleine in that way.

In the back of that cab, she was sex personified.

“I can’t believe you did it,” Hugo said, pulling himself away from her briefly just so he could take a breath.

She smiled, that impish, girlish smile that always made him quite helpless. “I can’t believe you let me,” she said. “It seemed so wrong.”

“But you did enjoy it?” he asked.

She took hold of his hand, and forced it higher on her thigh, up under her dress, pressing his fingers to her soaking panties. Proof positive.

“It was electric,” she whispered in awe. “I’ve never felt anything like it.”

Hugo grinned. “Not even when we were dating?”

She nodded, accepting that her statement hardly flattered their early days together. But she said: “This was different. Even when those dumb college guys were hitting on me, it wasn’t just about the fact they were hitting on me, or they wanted to sleep with me.”

“It wasn’t?”

“I don’t know...” he felt her hand encouraging his to keep its pressure on her pussy through those sopping wet panties.

God, he could smell her in the air now, over the pong of old leather and ancient cigarettes from the taxi interior, over the sweet scent of her perfume, that tickle of spice that denoted female arousal.

She was using his hand to masturbate, and he could feel the shape of her underlying pussy as well as the intense heat.

She said: “I guess after everything that’s happened recently, I was really getting off on you being there. Watching me. Seeing how bad I was being. From what I now know about you, I could tell how it was making you feel.”

“You could?”

“I think so. It was so hot to imagine how hard you must have been sitting up there.”

“Was he angry, that you just left him after that?” Hugo asked.

“He was pleading with me to stay,” she said, then looked at her husband with another apology in her eyes. “I guess part of me wanted to stay.”

Hugo nodded. “You could have,” he said, and he thought she had to have felt the tremble in his body. There was such a profound sense of danger in the air. Such a colossal pressure on him now, talking of giving up all control, respecting her independence in this monumentally important matter—her being with another man. “You know that? I would have been okay with it.”

Madeleine either sensed the slight quiver in him, or picked up the signs of fear in his eyes. She shook her head gently: “We’re not ready yet. Even this was a big step.”

He thought it ironic after such an elaborate Date Night set-up, but there was no doubt in his mind how sage her point of view was, even in the face of his apparent enthusiasm for this strange concept of consensual infidelity.

“You’re right,” he said, stroking her thigh. “I can’t tell you how exciting it was to see you with him, or how I wanted you to blow my mind and do something—but if this happens too quickly, it could be too much.”

She kissed him, long and slow, and then they were pulling up outside their apartment.

When she was ready, she came out of the bathroom, leaving her dress behind. She looked incredible in her black lace and emerald silk underwear, slinking over to the bed before crawling onto the mattress.

Whether it was her outfit—the extravagant lace, the raunchy stockings and suspenders—or her recent brush with an older gentleman on the dance floor, not to mention a few younger yet inferior suitors, Madeleine seemed so confident, and so sexy with it.

Her expression of serious seduction soon broke into a broad grin, however, as she came to a halt on the bed, and paused on her hands and knees for her husband's enjoyment.

"God, you look amazing, honey," Hugo breathed.

"I was hoping you'd enjoy it," she said, sitting up, running her hands all over her body as though selling it to him.

Hugo sat on the window seat, in front of the open blinds, wearing only a pair of black silk boxer shorts and a plain white t-shirt. He could appreciate the view that might be obtained from across the street, by anyone from dozens of windows in the next building.

He saw Madeleine's eyes flicking occasionally to the windows as she slipped the straps of her bra down from her shoulder to her upper arm, revealing one breast and then the other to him, her nipples stiff in the air-conditioned air, though not from the temperature.

"Can you see anyone watching you?" he asked her.

She smiled, but shook her head. "I guess the college guys are out partying elsewhere tonight," she said. "I don't see anyone else over there."

"I'll bet there's someone hiding in the dark," Hugo said. "I would if I was over there."

Fondling her beautiful breasts, she grinned, "But you're here, so you get to see whatever you want."

She shook her hair over her shoulder, and lay on her side, one hand sweeping all over her body, her hips, her thighs, checking out the strange feeling of the stockings on her legs, and the sensual silk that covered her sex.

"So you had a good time tonight?" Hugo asked her.

"I did."

She teased him as he gazed at her, rubbing her fingers over her mound, over her concealed pussy, pulling the thin material tight against her so he could see the depression, the outline of her lips. She revealed more flesh, a hint of soft blonde down, as the soft silk sank into her lush vale, became a mere string for her to press into her tender folds, dazzling her audience with her pink flower.

“Is this what would have happened if you’d gone home with him?” Hugo asked her.

She laughed, moving around on the bed to end up on her back, her thighs parting, her hand pulling aside her panties to reveal all to him.

“I’m not sure he would have given me the space to do this,” she said, two fingers slipping into her pussy, spreading her moisture over her lips.

“He wanted you so badly—I could tell.”

Madeleine sighed as she touched herself. “I could tell as well,” she said, looking at him with that sexy hint of danger in her eyes. “When we were dancing, he was pressing against me.”

Hugo felt a ripple of irresistible jealousy course through his veins, intricately linked to the exquisite warmth of arousal. “You felt it?”

She looked at him, and he could tell she was examining him even more than he was examining her after their experience, her leisurely display allowing her plenty of time to assess him while her fingers danced over her pussy, checking he was really okay about this, really interested in hearing of her experience.

She nodded at last, said: “He was a big boy.”

Hugo swallowed involuntarily as a jolt of surprise pulsed through him. He hadn’t expected such a revelation from her, though now it came he saw that it had been unavoidable. If he was questioning her, how could she not say?

Blushing, she recognized the sensitive nature of what she’d said, the potential for offense. Some men—plenty of men—would be offended by the idea of their wives pressing against another man, of course, with the thought of his large size adding insult to injury. Hugo had never had doubts about his size, but the point of his wife having these experiences was that it was different, unlike what she had with her husband.

“Are you sad you’ve come home with this, and not that one?” he asked, slipping his own rigid manhood out of the fly of his boxers, loving her response as he revealed himself to her, the lustful smile spreading across her face.

“Not in the slightest,” she said, biting her lip, then shuffling forward to the edge of the bed as though for a better look, gently gyrating her hips to tempt him over.

Hugo took the hint, and moved to the bedside, dropping down onto the floor before her, his hands curling around her nylon-clad ankles.

“You could have, you know,” he said. “I wouldn’t have stopped you. As long as you told me about it afterwards, I’d have been happy.”

She smiled broadly. “I don’t think I was ready,” she said, then a wicked look stole over her face and she added: “I did have an extra dance with him, though.”

Hugo found himself chuckling at his wife’s admission. There was something darkly alluring about the idea that his pretty wife had this mystery about her, that things might not always be quite as straightforward as she presented them at first.

What had happened during her final dance with her older man? Anything could have. She knew her husband was no longer watching...

“One last dance, huh?” he said, trying not to show his emotion, not wanting to project any response that might discourage her from pursuing her insatiable desires.

She gave a small nod, cautious, still assessing his reactions for any hint of danger. “He caught me as I was coming out of the bathroom. Tried to persuade me to stay longer.”

Slowly, Hugo slid his way along the rough nylon covering her left leg, inhaling her scent, appreciating her stunning beauty while calming himself, refocusing his thoughts.

“So you danced with him again? No wonder you took so long.”

“I’m sorry.”

“I’m not. He wanted you to go home with him?”

“Yes.”

Reaching her thigh, where her surface temperature seemed to rise considerably, along with the spicy scent of her arousal, which drew him inexorably in like some powerful gravitational force.

She was so wet. Even before he arrived, he could see how deliciously turned on she was by this whole experience. Her eyes burned with her memories of the evening. All that attention from other guys on the dance floor—guys who had no marital duty to praise her, all lusting after her, circling like sharks. The older man who had taste and style, desperate to take her home with him. The hint of an opportunity to actually go home with him—take a brief no-strings step out of the mundane existence of her marriage and fall into the arms of another man.

Giving in to temptation, Hugo dived in to draw his tongue along her soaking groove, tasting her tantalizing tangy flavor, indulging in the proof of her powerful arousal.

Madeleine groaned long and low as he lapped at her juices, his nose nestling in her soft golden down, his tongue teasing her sensitive flesh, stirring the kind of feelings in her womanhood that she’d been craving all night.

Hugo placed his hands gently on her body, teasing apart her pussy so that his tongue could reach deeper still.

“You could really tell, then? That he was bigger than me?”

Dwelling on this point, Hugo felt he was really messing with that nugget of fear and jealousy that continued to reside inside his chest, but it only seemed to enhance the counterbalancing emotions, the excitement, the arousal.

“That last dance,” she said, pulling her panties further aside as though to help him, though she didn’t really need to. “I was rubbing against it.”

Hugo felt his hardness pulse inside his boxers. He responded with hunger, burying his face in her sex, sucking on her tender lips, penetrating her with his tongue.

“You felt him up?” he asked her, a touch breathless.

She seemed to catch on to the way her words were affecting him, driving him on as he made love to her with his mouth. Eyes blazing, she said: “We were dancing so close. He had his hands on my hips, pulling me in to him, I could feel him on my stomach.”

“Uh-huh?” Hugo prompted, without losing contact with her for a moment.

He kissed around her clit, inspiring a sharp inhalation from her, then her hands were coursing through his hair, tightening around him, pulling him to her so she could guide him perfectly to where she needed him.

His tongue snaking around her clit as he heard her say: “I turned away from him, but he pulled me back against him, and I could feel it against me...”

He felt her whole body shiver as she said slowly: “So hard... so big... so hot...”

He stood up, feeling something innate, powerful, primordial inside him spurring him on, pushing him to assert himself, reclaim what was his.

He hauled himself up, reveling in the look of uncertainty and trepidation on his wife’s pretty face—she seemingly suddenly nervous she’d gone too far, pushed him past breaking point, deeply upsetting him by such explicit references to another man. He grabbed her, hands planted on her hips, turning her, shoving her—brutal, selfish, animalistic.

Madeleine gasped, and then her features broke out into a broad, blazing smile as she saw that he wasn’t angry, wasn’t upset—he was spectacularly turned on.

She allowed herself to be manhandled, her body pliant to his wishes, even trying to preempt them and position herself off the bed as he wanted, up on all fours, her shapely rear toward him, her glistening rose-red pussy framed by her pale flesh and the stark black of her suspenders.

A last nervous glance back at him, like a gazelle watching for its predator, and he was on her, pouncing, falling on her, his arms sweeping over her, pulling her in, his huge, pulsing, searing column piercing her, plunging forcefully into her, filling her entirely.

Oh, she knew her husband had nothing to fear about his size. When he was this hard, he took her breath away. It had been fun to tease him, though. Certainly provoked the right response.

“You think it would be like this? If you’d gone home with him?” he asked her.

“Oh yes...” she sighed. Such a melodic, exquisite sound.

“I know there’s no way he could have resisted you. He’d be inside you as soon as he had you alone.”

Hugo thrust into her powerfully, glorying in just how erect these strange thoughts made him. The beautiful blonde angel so tight as he squeezed inside her, his long, thick manhood splitting her cheeks as he entered her, his abdomen slamming against her behind as he pounded her.

“I bet he’d fuck you like this,” Hugo declared, his voice raised over the cacophony of her moans, the f-word sounding strange coming out of his mouth, but so wonderfully filthy.

“Oh fuck yeah...” she yelled, but then added: “Maybe it would even be harder.”

Hugo stepped up his effort, pounding her harder, knocking her breath out of her body with each impact, her body writhing and oscillating so gracefully as he rocked her with each hit.

“Oh harder than that...” she cried, whimpering a little from the intensity of his penetration though she was pleading for more.

“Like this?”

He put everything he had into ramming her, knowing he was sacrificing his staying power to fulfill her need for the most monumental pounding she'd ever received.

Afterwards, they simply collapsed, settling into an intimate embrace, Hugo spooned around Madeleine, continuing to breathe her in as the lingering sensations continued to ripple around both their bodies, echoes of their colossal passion bouncing around inside them.

As Hugo found himself failing to get to sleep, he was thinking that role-play was not going to be enough any more now that they'd tasted a hint of what reality could be. And he decided that to truly appreciate the beauty of his wife's sexuality, he really was going to have to set her free.

Fifteen

Midweek, Madeleine had to meet one of her new authors in Baltimore, with the meeting scheduled fairly late in the day so she could take him out to an evening meal.

Hugo knew she'd be late back, so took his time getting home after work, and decided on a Dominos pizza for supper.

Madeleine had met with a load of authors as her small press project began enticing submissions, but only a few of them had included evening dinner, and this was the first one where she had to go out of town. Usually, the authors came to New York to see Madeleine.

It gave Hugo butterflies knowing she was having dinner with an author—even though he knew it was strictly a business meeting, he also knew how she flirted with her authors at those book signing evenings, and over dinner it was going to be one-on-one.

This evening, he couldn't help but imagine a phone call from her, laced with excitement, whispering a request to let her stay with her author a little longer, perhaps even overnight.

It was about 10 pm when his cell eventually rang.

"Hey," he said, putting the phone to his ear as he relaxed back in the sofa. He could hear the constant clattering of the train in the background. It amused him that the confirmation she was on her way home came as a faint disappointment—not because he didn't desperately want her home, but because he'd wanted her to enjoy herself in another city, taking advantage of the kind of freedom most wives simply did not have.

"Hey," she replied. "I'm on my way home—probably two hours away now."

"Meeting go well?"

"Yeah, it was good. Feel pretty good about this one."

"You have some wine at dinner?"

“Not much,” she giggled.

Hugo smiled, recognizing the leisurely way she was forming her words—the influence of alcohol. He said: “You should get a little sleep the rest of the way. Not like you’ll miss your stop.”

“I am way too buzzed to sleep,” she said. “I wish you were here.”

“I wish I was there too,” he said. “Train crowded this evening?”

“No. It’s just me and a couple of guys.”

“That’s good, you can relax. Hate it when the train’s too full.”

Then Madeleine said in hushed tones, “One of the guys keeps looking at me.”

Hugo pushed his pizza out of the way. He said, “You worried, honey? You want to find another seat in a different car?”

But she said, “No. I like it. He’s cute.”

Hugo caught his breath. He said, “Where is he sitting?”

“Maybe 30 feet away.”

“He’s facing you?”

“Yes. He’s sitting in one of the single seats on the other side of the aisle. I think he can see up my skirt,” she said, almost a whisper.

“What are you wearing under your skirt?” Hugo asked, his voice suddenly husky as he felt the heat of arousal blooming inside him.

“A pair of gray panties—nothing special.”

“You weren’t wearing stockings this morning,” he said, testing her. Was she role-playing? Or was she telling the truth? There was no doubting she was on the train. Sure, She might have been sitting there in a pair of jeans, rather than a short skirt. There might have been no one in the train car at all other than her.

“I got a ladder in my nylons,” she said. “I had to find something at short notice.”

“Are you going to give him a show?” Hugo felt butterflies fluttering around his stomach.

“I want to,” she whispered. “My skirt is really riding up. I guess he can see I have hold-ups on. Probably my underwear, too.”

“You’re a bad girl, honey.”

“You feel bad that he can see my underwear, sweetie?” she asked. “Does it make you jealous?”

“Uh... no, honey,” he said, though it wasn’t completely true. The way his stomach flipped over attested to that.

“Not even if I tell you the guy has his eyes all over me?” she said.

He chuckled. “Sounds like you’re having fun. Are you sure he can see anything? He might just be staring off into the distance—you know, unfocussed.”

“Oh, he can see me,” Madeleine said quietly. “He’s watching me rubbing my thighs together, he’s staring at the tops of my stockings.”

“You’re so beautiful, honey. I’ll bet he can’t take his eyes off you.”

Hugo heard his wife let out a long, gentle sigh. She said: “I wish you were here to watch me, sweetie. See me stroking my thighs, running my hands over my sexy stockings...”

Now it was his turn to let out a sigh, longing to be there on the train, to see her.

“Is your cock nice and hard?” she whispered now.

“As can be,” he replied.

“Mmm...” she purred. “I think my audience is the same. He keeps shifting in his seat. He’s uncomfortable in his pants all of a sudden. Probably because he’s watching me opening my legs... my fingers slipping between my thighs... over my pussy...”

“Is he a college guy?” Hugo asked her.

“No. Older. Older than us—a businessman. Fortyish, I’d say. Very handsome. Makes me want to smile at him.”

“He’d like that.”

Madeleine let out a little giggle. “Well,” she said. “He definitely knows I’m onto him now. He’s gone bright red.”

“Are you touching yourself, honey?”

“Oh yes,” she moaned quietly. “I didn’t realize how wet I am. My panties are soaking. I bet our friend can see. Gray cotton is hardly good at keeping a secret like that.”

“Is he watching you?”

“Now he is. He looked away for a moment or two after I smiled at him. Now he’s back.”

“You like that he’s watching you, honey?”

“I love it. I’m making two sexy men hard right now,” Madeleine moaned. “You dare me to take off my panties?”

“I dare you.”

“Hold on.”

Hugo heard some fumbling. The phone moved somewhere, presumably while his hot little spitfire removed her underwear so that a stranger could see her pussy.

“They’re off,” she said, returning to the phone. “Our friend is looking at my bare pussy. Watching me touching it.”

He heard her moan, heard her labored breathing. Was she faking it? Was she putting on the whole thing?

“I’m so wet, honey,” she said between deep breaths. “I feel so dirty, a complete stranger is watching me playing...”

“Does it feel good, honey? As good as you’re making me feel?”

“Listen...” she said, and after a brief pause, he heard the phone being moved again, the microphone crackling and roaring as though he was listening to a gale.

Then he heard a sound he thought at first was somebody chewing—before it dawned on him what it really was.

His wife’s finger stirring inside her hot, wet little pussy.

“Did you hear it?” came his wife’s voice at last.

“Yes,” he breathed. “You know, I really thought you were kidding. Putting on an act.”

Madeleine laughed. “You’ve seen me put on a few acts,” she said quietly. “I thought we could take it up a notch. God, if I was acting, I wouldn’t be dripping all over the seat...”

“So there really is a businessman watching you?”

“He’s as hard as you are thinking about him watching me.”

Hugo gripped his rigid cock, picturing the scene, wishing he could see her for himself. The jealousy nagged at him, but somehow merely heightened the burning rush of arousal he felt.

“He’s doing something,” Madeleine whispered now. Then he heard her quietly gasp. “Oh God... he’s pulling it out.”

Hugo felt his heart beating in his chest, every pump somehow separate, suddenly syncopated instead of its regular rhythm.

“It’s big,” she whispered. “He’s looking at me now, he’s stroking it... It seems so wrong... Are you still there, honey?”

Hugo cleared his throat. “Uh... I’m here.”

“I’m going to sit with him.”

There was movement again, he heard his wife’s breathing, and then her voice off-microphone, in the distance: “Mind if I sit here?”

Hugo felt his stomach rolling over, the butterflies rampaging through his intestinal tract. What was she doing? What if it was too much? What if he wanted her to stop? She was on a train, miles away. No way he could get to her.

“I’m sitting opposite him,” she whispered into the phone now. “Are you there, honey?”

He gulped.

His wife was sitting opposite a man with a raging erection poking out of his fly, wearing no panties, her pussy soaking, her chest heaving.

Hugo had never felt more alive. His cock was rock hard, throbbing with need.

“I’m here, honey,” he said.

“I want to touch it, sweetie. I want to know what it’s like. It’s so hard...”

Hugo stroked his rigid shaft, feeling more than a little breathless. He felt so very vulnerable, so completely powerless. What if he said ‘no’, and Madeleine refused to bow to his command? There was something profoundly sexy about the thought of her as such an independent, bright young woman, though.

“You want to, honey?” Hugo asked her.

“Oh, yes,” she sighed. Then she said, “Nobody needs to know, sweetie. He’s a stranger. I don’t even know his name. He doesn’t know mine.”

Hugo stood up, his phone pressed firmly to his ear, his head whirling, yet no discernible thoughts emerging from the fog of his brain.

“There’s no one around,” Madeleine whispered. “What d’you think, sweetie?”

Hugo didn’t know what to think. It wasn’t cheating if it was consensual. It wasn’t infidelity if he knew. He wasn’t going to lose Madeleine—their bond had never been stronger. And the bottom line was: he wanted his wife to be fulfilled. That flicked of pure happiness in her was priceless.

“Go ahead, honey,” he said.

“You know I love you more than the world?” she whispered.

He heard her say something away from the microphone, and then the phone was moving again, and there was the sound of Madeleine breathing over the dull clatter of the train, and then she was laughing and cooing, and Hugo got the sense that she had another man’s cock in her hands.

He heard her kissing someone—or something.

“Mmmph...” she said, her mouth full, before he heard her withdraw whatever it was, and say: “I love it.”

Hugo felt his cock throb. He felt as though the base of his stomach was filled with heavy, hot metal.

But then he heard her laugh again—such a clear, innocent, joyous sound—and he never wanted it to stop.

Anything to make her that happy.

“Oh sweetie,” she said at last, “It’s so big and hot and hard...”

There was the sound of friction, of kissing, of Madeleine moaning while her mouth was full, of wet flesh on flesh, rhythmic, regular. A low growl, a male groan of satisfaction that made Hugo feel a strange blend of nausea and excitement. How far was she going to go with this?

He heard her release her stranger’s cock, and then there was a fumbling sound.

“Still there?” she said, gasping for breath. “I’m pulling open my shirt. This is gonna get messy.”

There was more heavy breathing, urgent now, the pace quickening.

“Oh God, he just came all over me,” she said. “I’m going to have to go clean up. I’ll see you at home, honey.”

After the call, Hugo felt strangely light-headed.

It was only a blow job, wasn’t it? That was hardly anything.

He poured himself a glass of scotch, the alcohol burning his throat but loosening him up a little as he awaited Madeleine’s return. While he waited, the television was on, but he didn’t focus on it at all, didn’t even notice what was on.

As he waited, he mulled over the evidence as to whether her phone call had been real, or yet more role-play. She did have a real gift for role-play.

What a thrill it had been. His jealousy had been real, but it wasn’t just excitement he felt alongside it. For some reason, he felt a huge weight lifting off his shoulders—and it took a little while before he understood that it was guilt evaporating, guilt of a man who had been unsure whether he was good enough for his wife ever since she'd descended into her own version of Hell.

Allowing her the freedom to play with other guys made him feel he was no longer restricting her from experiencing the joys of life. Right or wrong, it felt like absolution from his inner guilt.

Hugo felt the hardness returning to his own cock as Madeleine texted him to let him know she'd pulled into Penn Station. Then, another to tell him she was getting off the subway, walking down their street. He was pacing like a caged tiger by the time the front door finally opened, and there was Madeleine.

"Hey, sweetie," she said.

"Hey," Hugo tried desperately to keep calm as he laid eyes on her pretty face—and the saucy clothes that looked nothing less than hooker-chic right now.

His wife dropped her briefcase by the door and removed her jacket, to hang it up on the coat stand in the hallway. It left her in a white shirt unbuttoned sufficiently to show a black bra, and a scandalously short skirt that showed off her lace-top stockings to full effect.

"There is no way you wore that to your business meeting," Hugo said, leaning back against the doorway through to the kitchen.

"Didn't I tell you?" Madeleine was grinning like a minx as she slowly walked toward her husband, unbuttoning her shirt, pulling it off and letting it simply fall to the ground. "I got runs in my nylons—I had to change."

"Runs in your stockings wouldn't have been as shocking to your fellow passengers as that skirt."

Madeleine shrugged, "I was feeling playful."

Hugo saw her lick her lips as she laid eyes on the hardness straining through his pants, and it made him wonder if those lips had truly been around someone else's cock earlier that evening.

Now she reached behind her back to spring the catch on her bra, which she also allowed to fall to her feet to reveal her sweet, pert breasts peaked by stiff little nipples.

"Are you hungry?" Hugo asked her, as he often did when she came home late, though she'd never come home late looking quite this hungry before.

"Are you going to feed me?" she asked, and reached under her skirt to slip her panties down over her thighs, shimmying her body a little to allow them to drop to the ground.

Hugo noticed how wet her panties were, the pale gray cotton dark where her moisture had seeped—not just a spot, the whole crotch.

"Of course," he said as she approached him now. "I just didn't know if you'd already had something on the train."

There was fire in her eyes as she said, "Oh, I had something on the train. But I still have an appetite."

She reached up to kiss him, swamping him with her cherry-vanilla scent, his hands falling naturally onto her soft, smooth butt as she pressed herself to him. Her kiss was so sweet, but he was distracted by her fingers fumbling with his belt, forcing open his pants, pushing them down to the floor.

"Mmm..." she purred. "I've been waiting for this."

Hugo felt her hot stomach pressing against his rigid cock now, as she leaned up to whisper in his ear. "Go sit on the bed."

She followed him through to the bedroom, seated him on the edge of the bed facing the windows, and sank down on her knees between his thighs, taking his manhood in her hands.

"You know," she said, kissing the tip of his cock. "I never had two in one day before."

"Could become common," he said with a groan as she bobbed down on his shaft, enveloping his sensitive flesh with her wet heat.

“It’s hard to believe how lucky I am sometimes,” she grinned.

He watched her sucking his cock, and thought about how she’d been doing this to a complete stranger earlier that evening. He wished he’d seen it, wished she’d decided to FaceTime it or Skype it, though the reception was always crappy on those trains. It was quite a view, to see her naked other than her sexy stockings, head buried in his lap. It must have been irresistible on the train.

The way she leaned forward and upward to reach his cock made it easy to see her glistening pink pussy. She was so beautiful, from any angle.

His imagination started to fill in the scene, adding details, changing the decor. He was suddenly picturing the interior of a train—the Acela Express, mostly empty on a midweek evening back to the city. A pretty businesswoman on her way home, feeling frisky, playful. Gently stroking her pussy through her underwear while semi-aware that the older businessman facing her might be able to see her.

Calling her husband to warn him before drifting over to kneel between the businessman’s thighs, accepting the hard flesh he offered her.

He pictured his wife going down on another man in the middle of a public train car.

Madeleine flashed him an impish grin, taking his cock out of her mouth to spread his clear pre-come over her cheeks and lips. She said, “Are you thinking about it? Me on the train?”

He nodded.

“I think you’re harder than I’ve ever seen you, sucking your cock,” she said in disbelief. “Do you really think I was going down on that guy on the train?”

Hugo felt the penny drop. “You weren’t?”

Madeleine smiled, and suddenly pulled away from him, hopped up and dashed out of the room. When she came back, she was holding her briefcase.

Confused, her husband watched her withdraw a banana from the case.

“You faked it,” he said in barely more than a whisper.

She grinned broadly, and now sat down between his thighs again, this time taking the banana as though it was a penis, to demonstrate her trick from the train.

“You really would have let me do that?” Madeleine said. “It would’ve turned you on this much?”

Hugo took a deep breath, waiting for her to get angry, to accuse him of thinking her worthless.

“Well...”

“When you thought I was actually with another guy—were you jealous at all?”

“Of course I was,” he insisted, not sure how he was going to get out of this.

“But you liked it?”

“I don’t know. I guess. I just like thinking of you... in that way. Being so sexual.”

“You don’t worry that if I was with someone else, I’d leave you? Lucy said that might happen.”

“I guess there’s that risk,” he said, swallowing, his throat feeling so dry. Feeling a little strange that Lucy was apparently advising her in these matters. “I just don’t think it’d happen. You didn’t marry me for the sex.”

She was silent a moment, and he was suddenly worried she’d decide he wasn’t showing her respect, or she’d accuse him of not really loving her, if he could imagine her with other men.

He tried to soften the impact of any anger, conceding, “I guess it’s just some kind of weakness.”

She looked up at him, and he watched her sharp, bright eyes examining him. Then she said almost in awe, “I don’t think it’s a weakness. I think it shows a real confidence... underneath.”

Madeleine was looking at him suddenly so seriously. As though it was the first time she was taking all this on the level—previously, it had all been a little light-hearted fun, she had been teasing him, making fun of him, even.

Suddenly, it was real; she had confirmed that her husband could handle this. She looked shocked, her pretty eyes wide, mouth open in a round “o” shape as enlightenment flooded through her.

She said, “You know you’re right, don’t you?”

“Right?”

“I didn’t marry you for the sex,” she smiled, but blushed. “I mean it was always good...”

“Was good,” he nodded.

“You know what I mean. Is good.” She grabbed his softening cock now, kissed it. Now it was her turn to take a deep breath, before she said: “What I was saying was, you were right to say it would never happen. Leaving you. I could never cope without you.”

Hugo felt his insides thawing.

Madeleine smiled, reminding him just how exquisite that expression could be. She said: “When you have a conference away from here, or you’re meeting a client in some godforsaken city on the West Coast, I don’t get to curl up next to you at night, I can’t stand it.”

Hugo found himself smiling now. It was nice to be wanted. It was pure reassurance against his number one fear in all this, to hear her say she couldn’t do without him.

As if to underline the sentiment, Madeleine added: “Even though it’s just a day or two, I only feel right again when we’re together.”

Hugo urged her up onto her feet in front of him. He leaned forward and down to kiss her soft stomach.

“I love you so much Madeleine,” he said, breathing in the sweet scent from her skin, stroking her with his face as he kissed his way up to the lower slopes of her breasts. “I ‘specially love it when you’re turned on, when you come.”

“You turn me on, you make me come,” she insisted.

He smiled, “Is it so terrible that I’m curious to see someone else make you come?”

Calmly, he took one of her stiff nipples into his hot mouth and sucked, and then the other.

“No,” she said, thrusting out her chest, spurring him on to devour her breasts. “It’s far from terrible. It was a shock when you first said that was your fantasy. I mean, I don’t think I ever thought you wanted to end things between us, but—”

“But you thought I wanted another woman?” he smirked.

“You have to admit, from the outside it does kind of seem unfair—I get to sleep with other men, but you don’t get anyone but me.”

“It’s not unfair—my fantasy is watching you, your fantasy is being watched. Seems pretty balanced to me.”

“Lucy thinks you must have some kind of trauma in your past you’re just working through. I wonder if I was that trauma. What happened.”

“What happened happened. I can’t really say it didn’t change me. I know I don’t ever want to go back to that place—but having been through that, I know how strong we are.”

“You think if we hadn’t gone through that, you’d still be having this fantasy?”

He fondled her breasts, held them, as though weighing them. He kissed his way underneath them, around them, taking in their softness, their pert shape.

“I don’t know. I know that ever since you started getting sad, I started feeling guilty that I was the cause—”

“Oh no—”

“And even if I wasn’t the cause, that if you’d married someone else, perhaps they’d have kept you back from all that despair.”

“That’s ridiculous, you can’t feel guilty—”

“It’s a fairly common response to depression in a loved one. I felt guilt, but then when I thought of you enjoying yourself on that train... and it seemed so very real... Well, all that guilt went away.”

Madeleine let out a little moan as he began to kiss his way down her stomach again, this time slowing down as he ventured near her mound.

He could smell the dark scent of her arousal as he reached her tidy little patch of pubic hair, see her moisture lining her pussy lips.

“You know,” he said, and she gasped as the back of his hand brushed over her searing hot pussy, “maybe I’m just going through some kind of weird phase. But we should have some fun with it—it’s not serious. It’s just fooling around.”

“It could get serious,” Madeleine said, shooting him a warning glance.

“Only if we don’t communicate properly,” he said, leaning down and turning his head in a slightly unnatural angle to touch his lips down to the top of her pussy and her clit.

Madeleine moaned, and ran her fingers through his hair.

Sixteen

They talked about it, but nothing happened.

They made love and imagined that Madeleine was with someone else. It still made Hugo seriously hard, but it wasn't taking that terrifying step toward reality.

It was seriously difficult to take that step, as it happened.

"Maybe we should just get super drunk," Madeleine said, as they were both already sipping a quiet glass of white in front of the TV one night. "Then we'd have the courage to actually go out and do it?"

Hugo chuckled, but beneath the surface, he felt that undercurrent of icy fear. What if they did get steamingly drunk? Maybe they would be able to finally go through with it, The Fantasy, which neither of them could stop thinking about these days, but neither of them could initiate.

It was all very well being bold, and talking about doing it—but it was quite another thing to actually go out there and do it.

Even when Madeleine was flirting with her co-workers, suddenly now that they were both talking about taking the very real step of having her sleep with another man, she felt an invisible barrier limiting that flirting process.

One evening, she revealed that her personal trainer had got a little too personal—but rather than embracing it as she was permitted to do, she found herself frightened, and scampering out of there to return to the safety of her husband at home.

"He wasn't the right guy," she said.

Hugo shook his head, though he was rock hard after hearing how the guy had accidentally-on-purpose brushed his hand over her pussy during their last session, even if it was protected by her gym outfit.

"He's not your type," Hugo said. "Athletic, sure, but he's got no class whatsoever."

She smiled at that hidden complement.

“You think it’ll ever happen?” he asked her, actually thinking to himself that he would be okay settling for fantasy-only, since at the end of the day the whole thing had turned Madeleine into a confident sex goddess, it wasn’t merely about the actual act of her being with another man.

She said, “I think it will, some day.”

Another Date Night. It was something that had lapsed as a regular event as the Fall rolled on toward winter, with either of them, or both of them, finding their schedules all booked up. It didn’t disappear completely, however.

Sometimes, it was just nice to have it there to look forward to, even if the date got postponed for one reason or other. They might have arrived at a stalemate situation regarding The Fantasy, but it was great to know they had an evening coming up where it was just them again, a full night where they would not talk about work, and think of themselves as young free libertines again, on a date that would turn into hot sex by the end.

This time, it was Madeleine’s turn to decide where they should meet, and what they should do. As he left work on that Friday night, Hugo found himself a touch dizzy in anticipation of reconnecting with his beautiful wife after a long, hard week.

The moment the clock struck six, and his mouse pointer sank to the bottom left of his screen to shut down his tired old PC for the weekend, Hugo’s phone vibrated to signal the arrival of a text message. As he felt the buzz, knowing who it was, he felt his heart rate pick up a little, his loins tingle from the prospect of what the evening might have in mind for him.

The number was unfamiliar—not her regular mobile phone, then. You could pick up pay-as-you-go phones easily and cheaply enough, however.

The text read:

> Your companion for the evening will be waiting for you at the bar in the W Hotel at 7 pm.

His companion. Of course he knew that she was referring to herself, but what did companion actually mean? What role was she taking on? Was that a nice way to say she was a hooker, a call girl? Well, it wasn't The Fantasy, but if this was her choice for the evening, it would be hot to think Madeleine might have fantasies of being paid to sleep with men.

Hugo felt himself stir down below at the thought of straight-laced Madeleine dressing up as a prostitute of some kind. Would he be expected to pay for her services?

Her choice of venue brought a smile to his face, too, after the last time they were there.

As he left his office building for the weekend, he typed in his response:

> I'll be there. Can I ask how payment will be arranged?

Her reply arrived just as he came to the entrance of the Canal St. subway station.

> All taken care of. Thank you for your business, Mr Milton.

Business. He found himself sitting on the subway train gazing at that word in the middle of that last text message. Considering the fact that this was Date Night he was currently on the way to attend, that word seemed so out of place—and somehow, that sparked a flutter of nervous excitement within him.

Sometimes Madeleine managed to really flip the concept of Date Night on its head with her role-playing. The days of dressing up in smart clothing, or in costumes, seemed like adolescent fumbling compared to the elaborate schemes his wife could come up with.

Hugo found himself shivering as he waited for the train to reach Times Square. Then he was stepping onto the platform, negotiating the crowd through the turnstile and up the stairs to street level, his stomach filling with butterflies.

Back at the hotel just off Time Square, he ducked inside the small, dark entrance lobby and stepped inside the elevator along with a gaggle of overly excited tourists talking about their visit to the Statue of Liberty. He might not have been a sightseer, but Hugo was about to see another side of New York's beauty, and he was just a ball of energy.

The stylish reception area was relatively full as people prepared for the start of the weekend.

Hugo meandered his way through the clusters of people and found the bar.

Subdued electronic jazz punctuated the air, concealing all conversation, while the subtle scent of some kind of incense lent the place a warm hint of excitement even before Hugo stepped into the place.

He paused at the door, checking his watch to ensure he'd arrived on time, and allowing his eyes to adjust a little to the gloom.

Hugo quietly gasped. There she was—and wearing a scandalously tiny dress.

She was absolutely stunning. The purple cocktail dress had to be the smallest, most revealing thing she'd worn yet. The thigh-high stockings added to the image that she was a high class call girl, though she managed to keep the look from being trashy.

With her long blonde hair tied up in a French plait, revealing her elegant neck, and her pretty face emphasized with a little heavier make-up than usual, Madeleine really was putting the class into the high-class call girl look.

She looked out-of-this-world hot.

He could see that she was talking animatedly over a vodka tonic. Madeleine was not at the bar alone.

Hugo felt his insides burn as he laid eyes on the older, well-dressed gentleman currently charming his beautiful wife as though he was negotiating her services. Hugo knew she had no intention of pursuing The Fantasy that night, but she was obviously having a little fun with her ongoing freedom to flirt with whichever men she fancied.

He knew that if she did actually want this man, he would let her. He would be thrilled. Still the jealousy erupted inside his stomach, sharp and acidic.

Something held him there at the door. The sound of Madeleine's laugh—so pure and melodic, revealing genuine happiness. It froze Hugo in his tracks—such a stunningly beautiful sound.

He felt a gentle tingle between his thighs—and found himself curious about what Madeleine would do if he left her to her own devices with her gentleman admirer, just for a few moments.

A hint of mischief crept into him—he could tease her about this afterward.

He quietly edged up to the bar as far as he could away from his wife and her momentary companion, and nodded for the bar steward. A tumbler of whisky in his hand, and he slipped away to a quiet table over on the other side of the bar to see what his wife was up to.

God, she was so sexy. And Hugo could see in the eyes of the other man that he wanted to take her somewhere, no doubt charm her out of that dress. Did he think she was an actual call girl?

Sitting there in the shadows, sipping his whisky, the alcohol in his system wasn't sufficient to warm the chill inside him, though perhaps it tempered the jealousy a little.

The man was probably some millionaire businessman staying at the W as some kind of regular business thing—and he wanted Madeleine. But it was Hugo who got to go home with her. There was some weird kind of biological response going on inside Hugo—he was getting a thrill sitting here watching rival males circling his wife, wanting her, lusting after her—yet unable to have her because she was Hugo’s.

She seemed to be loving the attention from this older Romeo, flicking a finger or two through a loose strand of her hair, twirling it, fiddling with it, trying in vain to tuck it behind her ear. Was it his imagination, or was she arching her back to push out her chest, maximizing the impact of her prominent cleavage for her audience?

Hugo was actually hard—this was all sparking up so much arousal in him, an innate urge to take her away and claim her, put her to the sword for her insolence in consorting with other men.

But he texted her:

> Sorry, slight delay because of transport. Be there very shortly.

He saw across the room the beautiful blonde call girl react to the cell phone she kept in her little coin purse. Retrieve it, gaze at his message. Apologize to her companion, then type in a reply message. He remembered only just in time to slip his own phone into silent mode, so she wouldn’t have any clue he was already there in attendance in the bar, watching her.

Her companion, the silver fox businessman, signaled to the bartender to refill her glass.

Hugo jumped a little as his phone vibrated in his hand. Incoming text message:

> No problem. I’m waiting for you in the bar when you’re ready.

No mention of her having other options if he didn’t turn up—but then, there was no chance in her mind he wouldn’t turn up. A tiny part of Hugo wondered what she’d do if he didn’t arrive. Maybe it would pay her back for the little adultery act she put on the last time they came out to the W.

How strange it was to get the feeling of excitement at the thought of her offering their booked room for her new companion to share if her date did not turn up.

Hugo drained the glass of fiery liquor, and hauled himself up to his feet. She was going to get angry with him—and he didn't want to wreck their evening. He'd been looking forward to this for days.

Standing, he felt the alcohol in his system—a little stronger than he'd thought. He'd never been much of a drinker. He fumbled with his phone and realized that if he approached Madeleine from this direction, it would be a little obvious he hadn't just arrived.

Well, this evening was all about role-playing. He slipped out of the bar, back into the reception of the hotel, then sent a text:

> Sorry, just got here—heading up to the 7th floor now.

From reception, he could see through the entrance of the bar, see Madeleine reach for her phone, mention something to her companion before typing in a text message reply—the silver fox nodding sagely in understanding at her need to respond to her husband's message. Or had she given him the impression it was her client's text to which she was replying?

The thought that she might have been role-playing her fantasy as a call girl with this other man made Hugo's stomach flutter.

His phone buzzed as her reply came in, short and revealing nothing:

> Okay.

Then Hugo's stomach seemed to turn to mush as he saw the older gentleman lean forward to kiss his wife. It was on the cheek, not the lips, but the way in which he did so—slowly, breathing in her fragrance, lounging in the proximity to her, nudging against her soft skin—made her husband bristle.

He couldn't see Madeleine's expression from this angle, but the way she moved her shoulders and hips, somehow emphasizing her exquisite feminine shape for her new admirer, made Hugo certain she had warmed to this older lothario—and sent a shiver of envy and excitement down Hugo's spine.

Hugo watched the man leave the bar, stroll past him to the elevators as though he owned this place.

What did this older man have that Hugo couldn't offer his wife? Effortless charm, sure. Probably wealth, too, judging by his designer suit and the way he seemed to ooze pure confidence. But the biggest thing he could offer Madeleine was the newness, the strangeness, the out-of-the-ordinary experience of being with someone other than her husband. And that was Hugo's gift to give her.

Afterwards, she'd place the blame firmly on the alcohol. She'd started drinking early, at the behest of Lucy, even while they were both still out shopping for the clothes she would be wearing on Date Night that evening.

Troublemaking Lucy, who was already in fiery mood because Madeleine could never stop herself when it came to talking to her best friend about what was going on with her and Hugo—and the unconventional way in which this married couple had rekindled their sexual desires for each other had quite caught Lucy's interest.

Lucy had wound Madeleine up even before she'd got to the W to start preparing herself for her date. Champagne always went to her head, especially when she drank it early in the day. But by the time the evening came, she needed the buzz from the alcohol to steady her nerves.

Knowing she'd spent the day with Lucy meant Hugo was hardly surprised when he found his wife was still a little tipsy as he finally approached her in the bar.

"Hey, nice to meet you," she said.

"My God, you look amazing," he whispered in her ear as she rose to greet him with a kiss on the cheek. Breaking character, but then she really had outdone herself with the look, and he had to tell her.

She smiled, but he thought she looked a little flustered, somehow, her cheeks gently flushed.

“I dressed up for you,” she said, breaking character a little herself.

“Well you look incredible.”

“You know, you’re not the first person to say that to me tonight,” she said, a wicked glint in her eye.

Hugo raised an eyebrow. “Really?”

She blushed, full-on—not so much from embarrassment as modest delight. So sexy.

Madeleine leaned into him and whispered: “Some guy tried to pick me up just now—I guess he assumed I really was for hire.”

Hugo felt a pang of jealousy and arousal explode inside his chest, spreading through his body to kick-start the erection that had already been on the way.

As he paused to relish his physical and mental response to her revelation, he caught a flash of fear in his wife’s face—perhaps asking herself, was he really okay with her talking to some other guy at the bar?

“Was he attractive?” he asked, feeling mischievous.

Madeleine shrugged. “Well, he was no Hugo Finnell...”

Hugo rolled his eyes playfully, and he saw from that that she knew he wasn’t in any way angry at her.

His delight at seeing her like this seemed to be translating into a need to tease her, particularly given the easy cue she’d offered him. He said: “So if you had been single, and he asked you to dance...”

“I wouldn’t say no,” she finished his sentence, and he saw in her eyes that if he was in the mood to tease her that evening, she was in the mood to give it straight back to him.

“What did you say to him?”

Madeleine blushed again, peaking her husband’s curiosity no end. But she merely said: “I told him I was waiting for someone.”

“And he said...”

“He said if my date didn’t show up, he would be happy to keep me company.”

Hugo nodded, “I’ll bet he would, with that dress.”

Madeleine shifted in her seat, said: “Well, you can’t be jealous—you weren’t here on time, so I was either going to talk to the guy or look foolish for being stood up.”

“I’m not jealous,” he said, the fluttering, burning sensation in his stomach suggesting otherwise. “You know you’re not forbidden from talking to other guys just because we’re married.”

“Even in this dress?” she said. She slipped the hem of her aforementioned evening wear up her thigh to reveal a clear band of her stocking tops. Hugo noticed a few eyes around them observing the spectacle. It warmed him up a little inside.

“No harm in looking,” he said.

“Really?” her wry tone amused her husband. “Maybe I shouldn’t have worn a bra tonight.”

“Maybe you shouldn’t.”

Hugo could actually feel his heart beating inside his chest, the beads of perspiration welling up along his hairline. Was it stifling hot in here all of a sudden, or was it just him?

“Well, hey, this isn’t only supposed to be about you being a call girl,” he said. “We’re just supposed to be strangers, right?”

“Strangers, right,” she said, smiling calmly as he reminded them both of their game. “You know a stranger wouldn’t have reacted with such surprise at what I was wearing.”

Hugo nodded. “Maybe we need a script, huh?”

“And sound totally artificial?” she laughed. “You need to go upstairs to change—this is supposed to be a special night, right?”

“Of course.”

“Then we can play strangers properly when you come back.”

“Of course.”

“And stay in the role, Mister. Be as good as you were the last time we were here.”

“And what if your friend comes back while I’m gone?”

“You better pray he doesn’t if you want to see me again tonight.”

Hugo glanced around the bar to see if he could quietly spot a lone gentleman watching his wife’s progress. It wasn’t exactly full, but he couldn’t see anyone overtly looking their way.

“Or maybe we try it for real for once,” he said, his voice low, his expression dark.

He heard Madeleine quietly gasp.

She leaned in close, said in barely more than a whisper, “What are you saying?”

Hugo shrugged, trying to play it down, but inside his chest every internal organ seemed to be moving around, jostling for position to see how this played out. He said, “Maybe we actually find out what it’s like for you to be with someone else. You know—just for an hour or two, whatever’s normal for this kind of... trick.”

Madeleine flushed darker than he thought he’d ever seen her before, the rosy profusion spreading across her chest as well as her face. She said: “We need to talk about this, don’t we? I mean, we’ve never...”

But he saw her glance down, checking out her husband’s hardness straining in his pants, then her eyes returned to his, a question imprinted in them.

He said, “We’re in a place where nobody knows us. You have an attractive man who wants to spend a little time with you, and you know if you get uncomfortable with it, you can walk straight out and come up to our room.”

Madeleine slipped off the bar stool, looking a little shocked, from what her husband saw. He was expecting her to break out into laughter at any moment, tell him she’d been kidding, that they should go to dinner, she was starving.

But she ushered him away from the bar, towards a more secluded booth table.

“What if he wants to go all the way?” she said in a loud whisper, craning across the table towards him. “I’m assuming if he wants to hire a call girl...”

“Take some condoms with you.” Hugo gave her a broad smile, teasing her. “There’s probably machines in the restroom.”

“You know what I mean, Hugo Finnell. I’m serious—if I stay down here on my own, he will be back to see if my date showed up. He said so.”

Hugo held her hand. “We don’t have to do this, honey—it’s all a little sudden, huh? We can talk about this another time. We could just grab some dinner, enjoy the city, make the most of Date Night, right?”

Madeleine nodded, but she was unable to hide the hint of disappointment, of regret in her expression.

He said, “All I’m saying is, if you wanted to try going a step further, with a guy you’ll never see again, who you could never hurt by walking out on him—maybe it’s an opportunity.”

For an age, she just looked at him, he saw her eyes flicking over his face, examining him, determining whether he was for real, whether he was doing this simply to test her, or whether he actually wanted to explore her being with another man.

Under the table, he felt something brush his thigh, and then felt her stocking-clad foot slide over his legs to lodge against his rock hard cock.

Madeleine caught her breath as she felt how erect he was.

“You really want me to do this, huh?”

“I guess so.”

“This is real, Hugo,” she said gravely. “If I screw someone else, I can’t unscrew him.”

“I know.”

“So if there’s even a one percent chance you’ll decide you can’t handle it after all, I’m not doing anything.”

God she was beautiful, her sandy hair glinting in the halogen lights of the bar in that French braid, her pixyish face elegantly made up but spiced with a nervous blush.

Could he really handle the idea of another man laying his hands on her?

He said, “When you were on that train, you made me so certain you were actually fooling around with that other guy—I handled it, didn’t I?”

“I’ll say,” she said. “I don’t think I’ve ever come so hard.”

An elderly couple drifted past their table a little too close for comfort, no doubt on the way out to their own planned dinner, but there was no question the old lady had caught the tail end of what Madeleine was saying—she gave them both of them a highly disapproving glance.

It made Madeleine giggle, covering her mouth with a hand in horror at being overhead by such an inappropriate audience. Her peels of laughter simply turned Hugo on even more.

When they were alone again, she said, “I guess when I was playing, I did make you think it was real.”

“You did,” Hugo nodded, leaned back. “Look, if you like I’ll go upstairs, take a shower and comb my hair a different way, and come back down here as though I’m a potential client. Then we can go off, have dinner, and play it out, and I can even pay you for sex if you like...”

“And if the other guy comes back while you’re off having a shower?”

“You’re free to do whatever you feel comfortable doing,” he said. “If I don’t find you here, I’ll assume you decided to take the red pill...”

“It’s not The Matrix, Hugo,” she said, gravely serious. “If there’s any possibility of this affecting our marriage...”

“I can only say that you’ve already tested me in situations where only you knew you were faking.”

“So it’s down to me,” Madeleine nodded. “Can I handle it?”

Hugo tried to portray the picture of calm. “It’s one night. Not even that—you could be with him five minutes, turn around and tell him you’re sick, you’ve got to leave. If you like, we’ll never say another word about it.”

“And if he doesn’t take no for an answer?”

“You tell him your pimp has a Glock, and will track down him and his family with great anger and furious vengeance.”

Madeleine traced out the form of his hardness with her foot again under the table, and he was mildly impressed at her flexibility—perhaps assisted by her efforts in the gym.

She finally said quietly, “Okay. Go take your shower.”

Hugo felt his pulse quicken, his body forced into taking a deep breath. Either way, this could be hot. If she really did connect with someone who assumed she was a hotel hooker, it was going to be a huge step. And if he came down to find her waiting for him, they could imagine a fairly sizzling situation instead, he was sure of it.

“And take your time, don’t rush,” she said as he hauled himself up to his feet now, and it sounded like teasing, but was there a hint of hopefulness in her voice, that she would be hired by that other guy after all? “I’ll be okay down here.”

“Okay,” he said, amusing her as he shifted his pants to conceal his tent pole. “If you need more time—to decide, or whatever—just send me a text.”

Hugo leaned down to offer her a quick parting kiss on the cheek, but as he did so she glided in to kiss his mouth. She tasted so sweet, so fresh with the tang of alcohol lacing her mouth. He wondered faintly whether someone else would be kissing her later that evening.

And then he was thinking: would other men really pay to be with his wife?

“I love you, Hugo Finnell,” she breathed as they parted.

“I love you, too, Madeleine Finnell,” he said. “Nothing will ever change that.”

Then she beckoned him with a finger, so that he leaned down for her to whisper in his ear. “One way or the other, I’m going to fuck you later.”

She made him jump by squeezing his cock through his pants, but then Hugo found himself walking away, as though walking on clouds back to the elevators.

Was she going to be there when he got back?

Up in the room, Hugo felt conflicted as he stripped off and stepped into the glass-walled shower, allowing the wonderfully warm water to course down his naked body.

What did he really want?

His options were to take a quick shower and get down to the bar as soon as possible, so that Madeleine’s suitor had no time to make a move—or he could relax, take his time, allow the full possibility to go ahead.

Under the warm flow of the water, he felt distilled panic clawing away at his insides. It urged him to hurry, hurry, hurry, get clean, get dressed, get downstairs to snatch his wife from the jaws of danger. Yet the warm feeling of arousal seemed to keep that panic in check, pushing up his erection at the thought of the unbridled excitement and lust in Madeleine’s face, along with a fair amount of shock, as he had suggested the possibility of her actually being a call girl for the night.

He managed to slow his breathing, calm himself, take a leisurely shower, hanging on to the experience he’d had when Madeleine had called him from the Baltimore train, when he had been certain she was finally taking it to the next level with another man.

He had coped with that situation then—enjoyed it, even.

Even if he rushed his shower, dashed downstairs looking like an idiot, Madeleine might already be gone when he got there. He might as well take his time, enjoy this curious mix of emotions.

By the time he shut off the water and stepped out of the stall to grab his clean white towel, Hugo was actually beginning to hope Madeleine would be nowhere to be found when he returned to the bar.

Hugo felt his heart rise up into his throat, his pulse quivering as he left the room and headed down in the elevator to the lobby, then strode through into the bar, looking like a Wall Street trader, hair slicked back with gel in a way he'd never worn it before.

He would have to make up some kind of playboy backstory to kick-start their role-play. Maybe he was some kind of shipping magnate in town to check out the port facilities. Maybe he was a Silicon Valley overnight-billionaire, in town for a big meeting with investors on Wall Street. Maybe he was a scorned husband seeking the solace of hired company knowing his wife had left him for another man.

As he came through into the bar, Hugo actually gasped.

There was no sign of Madeleine.

Seventeen

He seemed to spend an age searching the darkened interior of the bar, seeking out every face seated round every table, wedged into every booth, and propping up every inch of the bar to see whether he was simply overlooking her.

His skin felt suddenly clammy, perspiration breaking out across the upper reaches of his forehead, and he seemed to be finding it difficult to get any kind of oxygen out of the air he breathed.

She was gone. Her suitor had returned, and she had gone with him.

“Jack Daniels, straight up,” he asked the smartly-dressed barman. “Room 2728.”

“Everything okay, sir?” the barman asked, and Hugo guessed that he looked a little more shell-shocked than he thought he did.

“Uh... yeah, thanks. I... uh... I have a slight cold.”

The first drink didn’t even touch the sides as it went down. The second he carried over to a small table in the middle of the room, to wait for her.

Perhaps she’d gone to the restroom. Perhaps she was teasing him.

Five minutes, 10 minutes, 15 minutes ticked by.

Then, his cell phone buzzed in his pants pocket. He struggled to pull it out, his suit pants fitting closely to his frame.

And his heart performed a small somersault.

> You out of the shower yet, honey? My client came back—I’m in a taxi with him, he’s taking me to dinner. Everything still okay?

Hugo felt his hardness pressing at his restrictive pants, his loins tingling at the thought of his pretty wife accompanying someone to a restaurant on the pretext of having sex with him afterward.

He felt the urgent panic rising inside his stomach again, pressing him to call her, text her—anything to stop her from going through with this. But it was such a thrill. Madeleine was going to have a really powerful experience.

The Fantasy was back on.

How incredibly beautiful she would look having dinner with her stranger, her suitor, no doubt finding it hard to keep from blushing profusely at the knowledge of what would come at the end of the evening.

How could he call a halt to all this? Madeleine had the choice to go as far as she wanted to, and if his jealousy became too much to handle, he could order her to come back.

Even if it didn't all go well, there would be some resolution to this whole fantasy of theirs—either it would be confirmed as something fun to do, or they could move on, no longer think about any of it again.

Hugo texted back:

> Just stepped out, sweetie. Have fun with your client—remember you can stop whenever you want to.

A few moments later, another text.

> Are you sure you're okay with this?

He replied:

> I'm sure. I'm so hard thinking about you enjoying yourself, honey. Only wish I could watch.

Madeleine replied:

> If this goes well, we'll have to find a way to arrange that.

> That would be seriously hot.

Hugo smiled as he texted her back.

Then:

> Taxi is stopping. Order some room service! Text me if you want me to come home. Love you.

Hugo sent a missive back telling her to have fun, he'd be okay. Then he headed back upstairs for what seemed like the longest wait he had ever faced in his life.

He put a pay-per-view movie on the television while he waited, but couldn't focus on the flick for a second. Initially, he kept telling himself she was having dinner. Whoever she was with, they weren't doing anything yet.

He'd been through this before—the belief that she was with someone else. Madeleine had managed to fool him into thinking it was all real, too, and he'd reacted accordingly.

How was this so different?

After half an hour, Hugo did begin to worry. Was Madeleine safe? What if she wanted to come back to him, and her client didn't let her? God, they were so stupid to do it like this.

At turns he was so excited, and terrified. He tried to dwell on the former. Madeleine was out enjoying herself. Experiencing life. Indulging in her carnal urges without the restrictions of a boring husband.

He couldn't lie down and just watch TV, and even switching over to one of the 10-minute teasers of the adult movies, he wasn't able to pass any time without thinking about what might be happening, checking his phone for messages and monitoring the time.

He kept looking over to the door, that same immobile door handle. When was she coming back?

Nine o'clock came and went, and he did break himself out of the whirl of conflicting thoughts and feelings to order a cheeseburger from room service. When it came, he managed all of two bites before the nausea in his belly took away his appetite.

Still, no messages.

He didn't hear her come in.

He'd actually fallen asleep, somehow. He had no idea how late it was when he was stirred from slumber by the movement as she sat on the edge of the mattress, removing her shoes.

The instant he realized she was back, he was startled awake by a burst of intense heat inside his chest.

What had happened?

"Hey, sleepyhead," she said as he hauled himself up in the bed, and before he really had time to open his eyes, she was leaning over to kiss him.

"Hey, honey," he said in between kisses.

Her lips were still waxy from her heavy lipstick. She tasted of alcohol and cigarettes—the latter particularly giving her breath a sharp edge he'd never experienced before since she had always been a nonsmoker.

She'd been with someone else. Hugo's cock sprang up.

How far had they gone?

Completely awake now, he put his arm around her shoulders and just kissed her. God she was so beautiful. She was still in her little purple cocktail dress, but in the low light of the single lamp she'd turned on, her hair seemed mussed up, tied back loosely in a ponytail now.

"What time is it?" he asked.

"Three, I think."

Hugo felt another sharp burst of shock and jealousy strike him hard inside his chest. Three? There was no way that dinner alone could have gone on so long. Even if she'd gone dancing afterwards, it was too late for her to be getting in, wasn't it?

"You have a good time?" he murmured, trying to hide the outward signs of the intense energy rocking his system.

She hugged him, her hands grabbing his head as she kissed his cheek, his forehead, his lips.

"It was amazing," she beamed.

With every breath, he was inhaling her strong cocktail of scent—her perfume, of course, and the cigarette smoke from wherever she'd been hanging out. There was also a hint of male cologne lingering around her—her client's scent?

And underneath it all, there was the dark smell of female arousal. She'd had sex with someone else.

"Great. That's fantastic," he smiled, feeling genuinely pleased she was happy, though he was a little confused at his own response.

"Was it terrible waiting for me?" she giggled, kissing him again, filling his vision with her smile.

"It's always terrible waiting for you," he said, feeling the need to play down the absolutely age he had spent on his own that night, pacing, sighing, peering at the clock, doing his best to suppress the anguish and paranoia that could otherwise have had him beset by fears of losing his beautiful wife.

She turned into him, and reached for another long, slow, sweet kiss.

"What happened?" he asked, dreading the question but needing its answer. "What did you get up to?"

She stood up, went to the mirrored wall behind the TV, checking her makeup. Suddenly nervous.

She said, "You didn't stop me."

"No."

He heard her take a deep breath. She said, "We had dinner at this Italian place across town. I... I didn't really enjoy it, I was so nervous."

He could hear the tremor in her voice. She was scared. Was she scared of how he'd react to her being with another man, or was she scared about something darker?

He found himself wanting to console her, somehow, to reassure her, to calm her down. At no point did he want her frightened, or anxious, or in pain.

“You stayed out late afterwards,” he said, trying to sound calm, reassuring, stretching out on the bed to get closer to her, show her he wasn’t angry. “He take you back to his room?”

She turned around, and in the light of the bedside table, he could see now the way her lipstick was smeared across her face. God, had she really used her mouth on another man? She had stretched her lips around another man’s big swollen cock—loved every minute of it.

Hugo felt his heart quivering.

She leaned down and planted an upside down kiss on his mouth, one hand gently pressing at the side of his head. Her ponytail trailed over his chest as he sucked on her lips, slid his tongue into her mouth. She tasted so different from the booze and the cigarettes. It was almost as though he was kissing a different woman entirely.

Perhaps he was. Perhaps she had now forever changed.

“Are you mad at me?” she asked in a little voice.

“For what?”

“Going home with him. Spending most of the night with him.”

“Of course not. Can you see how hard you make me, Madeleine? I just want to know all the details.”

She actually giggled again, a very comforting sound. Kissed him again, rubbed his nose with hers playfully. “Is this what you dreamed it would be like?”

“I think you’re very brave, Madeleine,” he said seriously, reaching up to place his hand on the back of her head, fingers sprawling out over the top of her neck as he pulled her in for a long tender kiss, indulging in her strange flavor, breathing in her wicked scent. “I wanted you to try this, you know that.”

“I know.”

“So did you have a good time?”

“Yes,” she whispered, and continued planting little kisses on him, running her delicate tongue along his lips, smiling broadly.

“You enjoyed being with another man?”

“Yes,” she whispered.

“He was good in the sack?”

Hugo felt his heartbeat thudding against the wall of his chest, hard.

Madeleine said: “He was fine. A little rough, but I guess I needed it like that.”

He stifled a gasp at the brutal confirmation that his wife had slept with someone else, tried to distract from it by reaching up to cup one of her breasts through her little purple dress.

Then she said, “What really turned me on was the thought of you waiting for me, going crazy about me being out with someone else.”

“That right?” Hugo smiled, breathing deeply, trying to dampen down the strong feelings of jealousy he felt, although those feelings also seemed to inspire powerful arousal in him. He added, “You always did like driving me crazy.”

Her laughter made him feel all warm inside, and he actually relaxed a little.

“You always drove me crazy,” she said, and then let out a little shriek as he grabbed her ass, pulled her onto the bed and over his head. “Talking about your fantasy. Fair’s fair.”

She lifted her knee up and climbed off him, looking down at him with admonishment in her eyes.

“I need a shower,” she said, peering sternly down at him. God she looked hot in that dress. He shivered just to look at her. She must have dazzled her client.

Hugo shook his head, gave her a serious look of his own. “Come here,” he said softly. “Give me what I want.”

She looked confused, but he reached for her knee, made as though to lift it, and she allowed him to guide it back over his head, so that she was straddling his face, her little black panties just a whisper away from his mouth.

“What was he like?” Hugo asked her, and pushed up her dress to reveal the tops of her hold-up stockings, and then her soaking underwear.

“A little older,” she said, still looking confused at her husband as he touched his nose to her panties, drew in a deep breath full of her strong fragrance. “Late forties, I guess.”

She seemed to take the decision to just go with it, whatever it was he wanted, and now sank down on his face, her satin-covered pussy touching down on his lips.

Hugo felt almost overwhelmed by the powerful aroma of her arousal as he opened his mouth to taste her tangy, salty flavor.

“I guess so. Distinguished, sophisticated,” she said, and now pulled her panties to the side to slide her glistening pussy over his lips.

“You’re so wet, honey,” he said, nuzzling into her, slipping his tongue in between her lips.

And he tried not to freak out about the distinct smell of latex that was lacing his wife’s arousal. The slight sharpness added to her flavor from the presence of her client’s protection.

Had she really taken someone else’s cock inside her beautifully wet pussy?

Madeleine gasped as he sucked on her folds, penetrated her with his tongue. She leaned back for a moment or two, enjoying the sensations rippling through her body from his attention, and then when she leaned down again to check he was all right, she had the biggest smile on her face.

She was so stunning when she smiled. He would do anything he could to inspire that.

“God he must have thought you were so sexy,” Hugo said between mouthfuls.

She gasped as he gently covered her clit with the heat of his mouth, and now felt her pressing down a little more, encouraging him. And she was reaching back, scoping out the hardness between his legs, which perhaps reassured her he was genuinely turned on by her.

“Tell me what happened,” he pleaded, reaching up now to cup her breasts, his wife leaning back to squeeze his erection while pressing her crotch down over his face.

She grinned. “You’re such a freak, Hugo Finnell,” she joked. He flashed his eyes at her, cheeks pushed out in a smile as he lapped furiously at her pussy.

“We had a really long dinner,” she said, pulling back a little, trying to regain a little control from him, show him she needed it a little more slowly if she was going to tell him anything about her earlier encounter.

Hugo smiled, allowing her some space, toying with her damp panties a little as she now spoke, pulling the material tight into her slit, kissing and licking around it.

“He told me all about his business, his upbringing in Georgia—I guess he was proud of how far he’d come,” she said. “He told me about his divorce, how his wife had run off with her boss.

“He had a big steak—I had the carbonara. It was a pretty fancy restaurant, and we both had a fair amount of wine. We just talked and talked, seemed like forever.”

As she spoke, she leaned forward again, pulling her underwear aside again, pressing herself down on his mouth.

“I guess I forgot to text you to keep you updated.”

“Never mind,” he said.

“Must’ve been close to midnight when we got back to the hotel. Nothing happened at all until we were inside his room.”

Gently, she grazed her pussy over his mouth and his nose, controlling her pleasure and guiding her husband’s pace as he continued to lick her, slipping his tongue out to slide through her slippery folds, flick over her sensitive clit.

She told him about how they'd got the business of the evening out of the way early on—her client had pointed to an envelope on his bedside table before he'd gone in to use the restroom.

She'd opened the envelope briefly to see it stuffed with bills that all carried the face of Benjamin Franklin.

"God, it felt so dirty, so wrong," she said, gently gyrating her hips to stroke his face with her sopping pussy. "And all that money kind of ended any thoughts I had of ducking out without doing exactly what he wanted."

She told her husband how the man had emerged from the bathroom wearing nothing but a pair of silk boxer shorts, his figure fairly trim for someone of his age, his skin tanned and chest dusted by graying hair.

"He walked up to me and said how beautiful I was, and I found myself kinda melting," Madeleine said. "Then we were dancing, but there was no music. Slowly stepping together, his hand slipping round to my butt, pulling me against him so I could feel how hard he was."

Hugo moaned as he felt his wife leaning back, squeezing his own hardness once again, her voice sounding so dreamy.

"I guess we just danced for such a long time, even with no music at all. He just seemed to need to be close to somebody—he was happy just to hold me, running his hands gently over my back.

"It actually helped calm me down, made me feel comfortable with him. I think he must have been quite lonely since his divorce, I felt a little sorry for him.

"I kissed him, and I think it really took him by surprise. I guess hookers aren't supposed to kiss their clients, huh. But he was a good kisser—slow, considerate, gentle."

Caught up in his wife's account, Hugo actually found himself glad that Madeleine could give some respite to a lonely sole, almost making him forget that she had been kissing another man, dancing with him in the privacy of his room, pressing against him and his erect cock.

“He unzipped my dress and I just let him slide it down my body,” she said. “Then he stepped back, and sat down on the bed, and I knelt down in front of him, helping him take off his underwear.”

Hugo groaned, picturing his wife facing the shocking sight of another man’s exposed erection, but somehow the jealousy wasn’t there any more. Only the joy of her wet pussy gliding over his lips, her narration underlined by her labored breathing and melodic sighs as he feasted on her delicious juices, inspired by the way her breath caught as when he pressed into her clit, the ferocious heat from her thighs and her slippery folds, the unusual scent and flavor of her pussy as he savored her.

He loved how confident she seemed, riding his face. How she let go of her inhibitions and any false fears about his lack of enjoyment, how she simply indulged in his implied consent that she could wedge her soaking pussy down on his lips, and he would willingly lie back and be her toy.

But now she eased off, beginning to find his intense assault on her sensitive flesh too distracting to continue her story—and she knew full well that he wanted to hear her story. She lifted, and his face was suddenly cool under a sheen of her juices, then she flopped down on the bed next to him, though with her head down next to his hip, her own hip nudging up against his shoulder.

“What happened?” he asked, and she smiled, grabbing his hard cock in her hand, squeezing him as she ducked down to kiss the base of his shaft.

“I just stroked him for a while,” she said, her palm now riding gently up and down her husband’s cock. “It felt really weird, you know? Touching someone else’s.”

Hugo lifted her nearside leg over his chest, loving the sensation of the nylon of her stocking grazing over his skin. He pushed her knee down, opening up a sweet view of her behind and her pussy just about covered by a thin band of black satin.

“Was he big?” he asked. “Bigger than me?”

Madeleine shook her head, kissed the tip of his cock gently. “No,” she said. “A little longer, perhaps, but not so full as yours.”

Hugo nodded, groaned as she slipped him inside her mouth, enveloping his sensitive helmet in her intense heat. His, the second cock she’d sucked on that night.

“Were you disappointed?” he asked her.

She shook her head again. “He could have had a tiny pecker, and it still would have been exciting—knowing what I was doing, what I was touching, while you were back here, probably tearing your hair out.”

“I only tore out a little hair,” Hugo grinned.

She smiled back, and in doing so provoked a dull throb in his cock, even while her hand was momentarily idle.

“You went down on him?” he prompted her to continue.

For an instant, she peered over at him, scrutinizing his face once more, trying to detect any possible signs that he was unhappy with any of this, that going on with her story might draw out the wrong kind of response from her consensually wronged husband.

He remained the picture of curiosity and arousal.

“He held my head as I took him in my mouth,” she said. “Showed me how he liked it.”

“And did you like it?”

“It was... sexy. I don’t know... I think part of it was just because it was forbidden, you know? Because it was dangerous, because it was so unexpected—I kind of thought you didn’t think I’d actually go through with it.”

“I didn’t. Not really. Hoped you would, but didn’t expect it.”

She slid her tongue over her husband's cock, and now nibbled her way down his shaft before licking her way back up to his tip and swirling her tongue around his swollen purple helmet, sopping up the dribbling fluid that spoke of his excitement.

He got the distinct impression that she was sampling him, comparing him to the other cock she'd tried earlier.

"I guess guys can't all have cocks as beautiful as yours, sweetie," she purred. "But I did like it. I was pretending to be someone else—a hotel hooker. Experiencing a life I would never have known."

Hugo felt a burst of warmth flooding his system now, at the satisfaction that he had been able to give his pretty wife such an experience, open her up to this real thrill.

"I probably went a little overboard, but he seemed to enjoy it," she said. "He had to stop me, though, before he came to a sticky end all over my face."

"I'll bet he had to cool off, after that treatment."

She smiled. "He poured us both a glass of Champagne. We did have a little breather."

"Then what happened?"

"He sat me down on the bed, and stood while I took him in my mouth again, getting him ready again, you know?" She was looking up at him again, checking he was still okay with what she was saying.

And then she lifted herself up, turned to straddle his hips, crouching over him so her pussy was inches from his rigid shaft.

"He fucked you? He actually fucked you?" Hugo felt himself gasping for breath, trying desperately not to freak her out, dispirit her.

In one movement, Madeleine sat down, taking his full length inside her well-lubricated pussy. He let out a long, low moan, only just managing to keep control, prevent an early explosion inside her.

"He helped me take off my panties, then he pushed me back on the bed, lifted up my legs, and he was there, touching his bare cock to my pussy,” she said, adding: “I had to remind him about protection.”

“Good girl,” he said as she started moving up and down on his shaft.

“I don’t think he meant to do me without a condom,” she said, holding his hand on her waist as she rode him, as though reassuring herself he was there, he was still hers, that nothing that had happened that night had done anything to damage their bond.

“I could hardly believe it when finally he slid his cock inside me,” she said, and saw some kind of reaction in her husband’s eyes as she bounced on his hardness that must have been elation, pure uncut elation as he throbbed inside her.

“Does it make you jealous, honey? Hearing about it?” she asked him, tucking a rogue strand of her hair behind her ear as she looked down at him.

“A little,” he conceded. “But it’s so hot, honey. Hearing how excited you were, how great it made you feel. You must have looked so sexy when he was making you moan, sliding his cock inside you.”

“You’re a strange one, Hugo Finnell.”

He flashed his eyes at her. “If you say so,” he smiled.

She pulled herself off him, and now lay down beside him, on her stomach. “Do me from behind,” she said. “That’s how he liked it best.”

Hugo felt his cock twitch at that. Leaving her lying on her front, he now lifted himself, slipping one knee over her thighs to lie over her, supported on his hands and knees, his cock gliding down between her thighs into the heat and dampness down under her round buttocks.

He kissed her shoulder and found it relatively easy to push his cock into her smoldering pussy, even though her thighs were clamped together between his knees.

Her pussy had received attention from two men that night. She was well prepared for penetration from such an angle, though they’d not really done it like this much before.

“Oh God,” she breathed as he pumped into her, now sitting up, two hands holding her waist firmly as he fucked her.

As his thrusting became faster, more urgent, he lifted her up, gave her room to reach forward and support herself on the headboard of the bed, while still presenting her rear for a more standard doggy-style entrance.

“Oh Madeleine, you’re so beautiful,” he moaned as he squeezed back inside her.

She smiled, and almost purred as he moved within her tight pussy again. She said, “Have I ever told you you’re the most amazing man I’ve ever met?”

They both came forcefully after only a little more swordplay, with Hugo feeling so strange yet so turned on to be the second man coming inside her that night, though the first had come with protection.

While Madeleine slipped away for a shower, Hugo collapsed in the bed, exhausted, falling into a deep sleep before his exquisite wife returned.

Eighteen

He was in a daze for a week afterwards. He wasn't shocked or horrified or mortally offended by what she had done: he felt a little strange, but underneath it all was unbelievably content.

It felt as though they had climbed some monumental peak, and survived. They had achieved a great feat, and come back to tell the tale. Hugo loved Madeleine more than ever before—the experience of knowing she had been with another man, had another man inside her, had certainly not shaken that.

If anything, knowing that she had finally gone through with it, taken the gift of her sexual independence and experienced what pleasures were available made Hugo feel satisfaction, that his gift had been enjoyed, appreciated, driving Madeleine wild with lust, turning her into a goddess of carnal desire.

He woke up the next day feeling serene. He was like some kind of zen master, he was so calm and quietly joyous.

Madeleine had fucked another man. She was so sexy, she was so desirable, she was his.

Every night that next week, they made love. The first few nights, they couldn't even wait long enough after getting in from work to have supper—their hands were all over each other, tearing off clothes, freeing up parts of anatomy for a quick confluence and red hot passion wherever they happened to be when the clothes dropped—in the kitchen, on the sofas in front of the TV, in the bedroom, even on the window seat, though the blinds remained closed. This was their time.

Hugo was unbelievably hard, though he wasn't always able to sustain it so long, the thought constantly on his mind that Madeleine had had a one night stand, giving her body to someone else, tearing up the marital rule book.

He wanted to know more and more details—did she suck him? Did she swallow his come? Did he make her come when he was inside her? Yes, yes and yes. It all added fuel to Hugo's fire, as he found himself subconsciously trying to compete with the other man, trying to assert his status as her primary, alpha male.

Madeleine was seriously wet, every time Hugo came near her. To start with, she found it difficult to open up about her experience, but each successive night she seemed bolder, opening up about how nervous she'd been, particularly as the monumental events arrived—stripping off for him, seeing him naked for the first time, putting his cock in her mouth.

Rolling the condom down his cock, straddling him, slipping it inside her.

She blushed as she said the man had asked about whether he might become a regular client.

"You could, you know," Hugo said, and saw a little shock in her face that he might contemplate such a thing. "You'd probably end up earning more than me just from dating him."

"Dating? It wouldn't be dating."

"But you'd enjoy it."

"I think if I actually started to be a hooker, I'd probably be so inept at it, I'd end up in jail in a week."

She told him she had had to stop going for workouts in the gym that week—only swimming was safe for her, she was so wet all the time. She had to carry spare panties in her purse in case her mind started drifting off to that night while she was at work.

She was also very affectionate that whole week—if they weren't making love, she was still touching him, brushing against him, hugging him, squeezing him, kissing him. Appreciating him, it seemed, much more than normal. He liked that.

In bed, she was somehow different, too. More driven, more open, more vocal in her responses to him and in demanding what she wanted.

At work, Hugo had to be careful not to make his colleagues think he was on some kind of medication. The first day back, Lowego stopped by his cubicle and asked him if he was all right.

“Of course.”

“You have this weird glow about you,” he said. “If you weren’t so ugly, I’d start wondering who got you pregnant.”

Hugo chuckled at that, but silently checked himself. He couldn’t afford to give off an odd impression. What if Ray had seen him with a glow about him? It would have been merciless taunting for weeks, if he was lucky.

“Well you obviously got fucked completely senseless last night.”

“I’m not sure I’m at liberty to tell you.”

“Seriously, and you’ve been married what, four years? Five?”

“Five.”

“I guess I found out what flicks her switch.”

“Jesus. God damn miracle if I ever discovered what flicks Rachel’s switch. Well, I guess Graham Beaumont from accounts flicked her switch a few times.”

“I guess. Still kinda raw.”

Hugo felt bad for Lowego, but it wasn’t really his place to interfere. He sometimes wished he could talk to the guy about his own strange journey with Madeleine, perhaps in the same way his wife could discuss things with Lucy. But he didn’t have that same level of trust stretching back to a shared room in college. And what were the chances that Lowego could share the same kind of philosophy on monogamy as he apparently did? Hugo got the impression that Lowego was finding it difficult to handle the thought that his wife had strayed, and perhaps always would. Unlikely that a guy like that would see consensual infidelity as the answer to his marital strife, then.

The rest of the week, Hugo was able to contain himself at work, conceal that buzzing effervescence inside him.

Then Friday came, and Madeleine was due for a night out with Lucy, just the two of them. Hugo didn't even give it a thought—the two friends had been having regular nights out since Lucy had moved to New York, renewing the kind of friendship they'd enjoyed back in Boston.

But then he mentioned it to Ray at work, and the guy's casual response suddenly got Hugo thinking.

"Girls night out, huh?" his co-worker smiled. "Sounds like trouble. Hope you've not been neglecting the bedroom duties recently, Romeo."

"I think we're fine in that department, thanks, Ray," Hugo rolled his eyes, something he very rarely did.

"Okay, dude. But if you want some distraction while your broad is out jiving with other guys in some seedy club somewhere, we'll be having a few quick ones after work."

"Sure, sounds good."

Ray sauntered off, pleased his little gathering in the bar would be a little bigger that evening—but he left Hugo feeling breathless. Was this the life he now led? Ray had pointed out that the cliché of a girls' night out was that the girls would let their hair down away from the gaze of their menfolk, and perhaps do a few things of which their menfolk wouldn't entirely approve.

Now they'd gotten to this stage in their new fantasy, would Madeleine feel she could go off and 'jive with other guys' on the dance floor or wherever else, without telling Hugo?

What if he received a text from her late at night asking permission to go home with someone she'd met in a club somewhere?

Sitting there at his desk, Hugo was frightened and excited all over again. He did actually like the idea of his beautiful wife having a good time on her girls' night out, flirting and teasing other men, maybe even going further—kissing, touching, even more perhaps. But there was something a little too terrifying about the idea that she might go completely out of control.

And he didn't like the idea that she'd have this thrilling time and then keep it secret from him. He wanted to share in her good times, even if he wasn't there when it happened.

It felt strange, though, to think of girls' night out with Lucy in a different way than he had for years. It was no longer the innocent night out it used to be—there was dark potential within it. With Lucy fully appraised of the new direction their marriage had taken recently, she would no doubt be encouraging Madeleine to run with it, and go for any young buck that took her fancy.

Hugo knew he had to talk to Madeleine, let her know how he felt. He didn't want to restrict her in any way, but he didn't want to be excluded, that was all.

The talk was going to have to wait until after this particular girls' night out, however, since he wasn't going to see Madeleine before it.

Madeleine seemed happy enough that he would be going out as well when he gave her a quick call before the end of the working day. The way she said she was pleased he would be grabbing a few drinks with Ray, Lowego and Davis suggested that she thought he'd been a little too focused on her happiness recently, neglecting his own social life.

"I do go out occasionally," he protested.

"What, when you're out of town on business, and you have no choice but to go out?" she chuckled. "You need to let your hair down, sweetie!"

"I suppose so."

“Maybe we need to enshrine a regular Girls’ Night and Boys’ Night to go alongside our Date Night from now on,” she said, sounding as though she was joking, or half-joking at least.

“Maybe we should,” he tried to sound upbeat, jovial. He wasn’t going to say anything about his new-found anxiety regarding Girls’ Night. He couldn’t quite get his head around it himself.

He wanted her to play with other guys, didn’t he? Why was he so nervous about this?

“So what’re you guys planning for tonight?” he asked her casually, trying not to sound as though he was prying, though that was exactly what he wanted to do.

“Oh, nothing much,” she said. “Some drinking, a lot of chatting, maybe some dancing later?”

“You will be careful, won’t you?” he said, figuring he was allowed to act the concerned husband, even though he didn’t want to dissuade her from actually having a wild night.

“Of course,” she said, and Hugo found himself mildly surprised that she didn’t then add some kind of reassuring statement confirming she wasn’t looking to fool around with anyone that evening. She just left it at of course.

Again, Hugo found himself wanting to tell her he needed a say in whoever she felt like sleeping with—but that dark little part of him that had first got him into this fantasy seemed to hold him back.

She’s even more sexy if she’s taking these decisions for herself, that devilish inner voice of his told him.

He lasted until about 10 pm, which was too late for a few drinks after work, but too early to be a real night out. An awkward time to go—but then he felt awkward.

“If her lipstick’s all smeared, you’ll know it really was Girls’ Night Out,” Ray said as he was saying his goodbyes.

Merely the thought of that made Hugo tingle a little inside, though he made every effort to laugh it off as though he knew it was simply a joke.

Actually, when he got home, the waiting wasn’t quite so bad as it had been at the hotel. He had the faint idea that Madeleine wouldn’t actually do anything significant if they hadn’t talked about the possibility first. This might be Girls’ Night Out, and she might be tempted to go a little wild—but kissing was okay, even some touching Hugo could deal with.

By midnight, he took a decision not to fret. At that point, he was assuming they’d all gone dancing, and even pictured in his head the kind of dancing she’d enjoyed with Dan and Ryan.

He even felt that he wanted that for her. As long as Lucy was with her, and she was safe, he was happy as long as she had a good time—and preferably told him about it afterwards, though of course the whole concept of Girls’ Night Out had a certain What-Happens-In-Vegas-Stays-In-Vegas vibe.

So shortly into the small hours, Hugo went to bed, and somehow managed to get to sleep.

He woke to the bang of the front door and the sound of girlish giggling.

Madeleine and Lucy had come back to the apartment together. Hugo leaned over to squint his eyes at the alarm clock in the gloom. Three o’clock in the morning. Well, it had been some Girls’ Night Out for them. From the sound of the laughing out there in the living room, the two of them were both fairly drunk. No doubt they’d decided it would be better if Lucy crashed, rather than go home to Brooklyn in such a state on her own.

Hugo actually felt relieved that Madeleine had come home with Lucy—it meant she hadn't gone to some guy's place.

It seemed to be taking an age to get Lucy settled on the sofa, assuming that was where she was going to sleep. What were they saying to each other?

“Well you're single,” he heard Madeleine telling Lucy.

“I'm single—and you've got a husband who fantasizes about you dating other guys. So where's the problem?”

“Come on—they were total sleaze-bags!” Madeleine was laughing. It didn't sound as though she was settling down for the night.

Hugo heard the bang of kitchen cupboards, and then the clink of glasses. They were still drinking, it seemed.

“I guess. That one with the earring in the top of his ear did have a big cock though—I could feel it when he was dancing with me.”

“Me too,” Madeleine said. Hugo felt the warmth of arousal spreading through his body as he heard Madeleine and Lucy talking about the guys they'd been flirting and dancing with all evening.

“And that didn't tempt you?” Lucy asked.

“It didn't tempt you, either.”

“I have a perfectly good vibrator that doesn't use too much cologne,” Lucy said, laughing.

“And I have a perfectly good husband that—“

Lucy's outburst startled Hugo. What was she talking about? Madeleine had had sex with another guy—hadn't she?

“I will,” Madeleine was saying now, not denying anything Lucy was saying. “I just need to do it at my own pace.”

Hugo's head started whirling around, as though it had been him drinking all night, rather than the women out in the living room. So she'd faked her hotel rendezvous—how had she managed it? He supposed it hadn't been difficult—a splash of male cologne here, a strategic use of a condom there. She'd fooled her husband completely—but he saw now that a lot of it had been taken on trust.

Did this break his trust in her? She had lied to him.

“Don't you think it's time to stop trying to understand why your husband's into this, and just go out there and enjoy it?” Lucy was saying now.

“I just needed to make sure,” Madeleine replied. “I had to make him really believe it happened. I needed to see how he would feel about it after a little while, you know? Once he'd had time to really think about it.”

“And he's okay about it, right?”

“I'll say. He can't get enough of me—every night this week.”

“Every night? Jesus. And you are married, right? You didn't fake that whole thing too? God.”

Madeleine was laughing, and Hugo felt any disappointment or resentment simply melt away as he heard that. Wasn't her happiness the only thing that was important in this? It was at the core of his fantasy. If she wasn't completely ready for this, he didn't want to go ahead with it, either.

“Are you gonna tell him? That it was all staged.”

“I should,” Madeleine said, then giggled. “But it's tempting not to—seriously: the sex has been epic this week.”

“Okay, if you tell him, then the next time you do this, you better go through with it. You fake it again, he'll assume you always will.”

“I know that. I think I'm ready.”

“Ready?”

“I'm ready to start dating again.”

“Woo-hoo!”

Hugo was so hard as he heard the girls clink glasses and toast Madeleine's resolve to actually start seeing other men. Those butterflies were back in his chest. It didn't matter that she'd faked her night at the hotel—now she had the intention to start dating, that was all that mattered. Hugo was looking to the future, it felt as though he'd passed all his exams, and his reward was a sexy wife who was going to make full use of her sexuality on a real adventure.

"How are you gonna tell him? About the hotel."

Hugo heard Madeleine say, "I don't know. I guess he might be angry I didn't tell him right away. It was kind of hot that he didn't know, though. Hotter, I mean. It was already hot that he thought I'd actually gone to that guy's room all night."

"You like having secrets from him!" Lucy laughed. "Saucy wench. Only, I guess his fantasy is knowing all about the details. You never did tell him your Dark Secret, did you?"

Hugo heard the emphasis Lucy gave to the words dark secret and his ears immediately pricked up. What were they talking about? What was Madeleine's dark secret?"

God, it made him feel a little nauseous to think what it might be—did it threaten their relationship? Surely not.

"No, but I think I have to tell him about this."

"I doubt he'll be angry," Lucy said, "But he might need you to sign in blood that you will actually start dating properly."

"Why do I get the feeling you're so obsessed about me starting to date again, Luce?"

"Obsessed? Ha! Okay, I suppose I am. A little. It's because you give me hope, Mads! You give married and potentially married women everywhere hope."

"Hope?"

"You know—hope that it doesn't all have to end when you get married."

“You do know Hugo’s not like most men. They don’t all want their wives to sleep with other guys.”

“I know. But there must be more where he came from. So come on—who’s it going to be?”

“Who’s it going to be?”

“The first date! You going to ask Connor out? Or one of the boys from the bookstore? Or that personal trainer of yours? Or one of your authors... there’s so much choice out there.”

Hugo felt his heart pumping. He realized he’d moved to the edge of the bed, he was listening so intently to the conversation. Who did his wife intend to sleep with?

“I don’t know. Maybe I should just do Match.com or whatever the equivalent is for adulterers,” Madeleine joked. “I’m not sure I could take dating someone I know, not at first. I’d worry I’d make a fool out of myself if it turns out I can’t handle it—or Hugo can’t handle it.”

“You’ve got to fact-check these things properly, Luce. You nearly gave our lawyers heart attacks on a regular basis.”

“Oh, slander schmander. You’re ready. That’s the main thing.”

“I think I’m ready.”

“You think you’re ready?” Hugo could hear the exasperation in Lucy’s voice.

Madeleine laughed again, such a beautiful sound. “I’m kidding—yes, I’m ready.”

Hugo felt a jolt of white-hot heat piercing his chest—it knocked him for six. How was he so horrified that his wife wanted to start dating? Until a few minutes ago, he’d been under the impression she’d already slept with another man. But he wasn’t really horrified—or at least, wasn’t only horrified. He was seriously excited, his cock hard as marble inside his boxers.

“And I’m ready for bed,” Madeleine added.

“Are you? Jesus, I’m not. I’m hornier than a horny toad from the Horn of Africa after tonight. Aren’t you?”

“Yes, but I have a husband in the next room, remember?”

Hugo heard his wife’s retort, and hoped she was serious about being horny. He could do with a little release after hearing their conversation.

But he suddenly realized he wasn’t supposed to be perched on the edge of the bed monitoring his wife’s private discussion with her best friend. He quietly thrust himself back under the covers, where he could pretend he’d been asleep all the time.

In the darkness, lying on his back, he heard her come into the bedroom. He had a dozen questions running around his mind, but he kept his eyes closed, feigned sleep. He had to hope she wasn’t going to respect his sleep—he wanted her to wake him up.

In the still of the night, he heard the swish sounds as she removed clothing, then felt the depression of the mattress as she climbed onto the bed.

He moaned, and let out a kind of sleepy noise that a waking man might make to inquire whether someone was joining him in his bed.

“Shhh…” he heard Madeleine in the darkness, saw in the low streetlight coming in through the blinds that she was crawling up his legs, her butt in the air, hands reaching for the bed sheets.

He couldn’t help smiling as she peeled the sheet from his body. He felt her breath on his skin before anything else, along with a few strands of her silky hair as she hovered over him, apparently looking him over closely, inhaling his scent.

“Honey?” he said, affecting a sleepy voice. “You just got home?”

“Uh-huh,” she said, and almost ripped off his underwear. He loved it—she was hungry for him.

“What time is it?”

“Late,” she said, and he moaned as he felt her hot mouth engulf his rapidly swelling manhood.

She stroked his length, then curled her fingers around it, lifting it so that she could look her husband in the eyes as she licked his cock from the base to the tip. Her eyes were full of lust, her inhibitions weakened by the wine.

He shivered a little in pure bliss as she parted her lips and sank on him, her fingers coaxing his shaft as her mouth enveloped his cockhead.

“You have a good time with Lucy?” he asked her.

Mouth full, she only moaned in return, “Mmm-hmm.”

“I was worried you might have met someone,” he said.

He saw her smile around his cock. Then she was licking him, lashing him with her tongue, tasting him, so ravenous for him.

“I do have something to tell you,” she said, slipping him out of her mouth for a moment.

“Oh, yeah? Something happen?”

Hugo was wondering if she’d decided to tell him about her hotel fraud, or whether she might be about to blurt out the dark secret to which Lucy had briefly referred. Neither of them did he want to force out of her, he had decided—she would have to bring them up of her own volition.

She said, “You promise you won’t be angry with me...”

With that, she sucked him back into her mouth, as though offering him a reward if only he was calm about whatever she had to say—or perhaps suggesting that if he was going to get angry with her, he wouldn’t get any more of this.

“Of course not.”

She glanced to the side, to the windows, as though it might give her strength, though there was nothing to see with the blinds closed.

“When I told you about my evening with that guy in the W last weekend...” she said.

“Yes?”

“It wasn’t strictly true.”

“What wasn’t strictly true?”

“Any of it.”

“Oh.”

He paused, as though mulling over what she’d said, but also milking the suspense for all it was worth. He wasn’t going to make her truly suffer, but she needed to know the seriousness of her continual lying to him. Oh, who was he kidding, it was fun to tease her a little.

Eventually, he said, “So you never slept with anyone that night?”

“Only you. It’s only ever been you.”

“And only ever will be?”

She massaged his hardness, gazing at him with a dangerous look in her eyes. “Do you want it to be?” she asked. “Honestly, when all is said and done, would you rather I said to you I don’t need any other man, just you? Say that you’ve offered me the temptation, and I’ve decided you are far more than I’d ever need?”

“No,” he said simply, and brushed her hair gently out of her face. “I’d like to think you don’t need any other man, and you’ll only ever love me with all your heart for the rest of our lives... but...”

“But?” she kissed the tip of his cock, held it in her warm mouth, feeling it inside her.

“Even if you don’t need them, I like that you want other guys. I like the danger, the thrill of you experiencing other people—as long as you come back to me afterward. I like knowing that you’re an incredible sexual being, and I’m not in any way holding you back. But I want to share in your experiences, somehow—even if it’s not firsthand observation.”

She sank on him, moaning herself as she fucked him with her face, as though his penetration was giving her sexual pleasure.

When she came up, gasping for air, it was as though she'd been underwater for long minutes.

She said, "Are you angry with me? For making you think it really happened back there in that hotel?"

He propped himself up on his elbows. "Not at all—it was a wild night, how could I complain? I'd do it again a hundred times if you wanted to, though I wonder if I might start assuming it's deception if it keeps happening."

She smiled. "So I guess the next time it has to be real. Can't be deception."

He pulled her up from between his legs, buzzed at how hard her nipples were, how beautiful her naked curves were in the horizontal lines of the light filtered through the blind.

He pulled her down on the bed beside him, sucked her breasts into his hungry mouth, drew out a low moan from her that was almost a growl.

"You want to do it for real this time," he said, feeling a beast growing inside him, a Mr. Hyde to his normal Dr. Jekyll.

"I don't just want to go out and sleep with someone random," she said as he spread his hands all over her smooth body stretched out before him, in awe at her feminine form.

"No?"

She was smiling in the gloom as he manhandled her, turning her onto her front, brushing his face over the sweet contours of her behind, and somehow her joy at his unbridled lust for her brightened the whole room.

She pushed her behind up, spreading her knees, urging him to have her beautifully wet pussy, which glistened in the faint streetlight.

"I want to find someone special," she said. "Maybe go on a few dates, find out if he's worth being the man I break my wedding vows for."

Hugo couldn't resist her offer, pushing himself between her thighs, burying his face in her tender folds, tasting her tangy juices, sucking her hot pussy lips into his eager mouth.

"I'd like that," he said. "Whoever he is, he has to be worthy of you."

She was smiling, slightly tipsy, but not merely from the alcohol, it seemed. She was drunk in the whole idea of being given free rein by her beloved husband to go out and start dating—and find some gorgeous hunk to fuck her senseless before returning home to her Hugo.

"We're really doing this?" she asked him, in disbelief despite the long process of preparing for this step.

"We're really doing this."

She bit her lip, forcing her head down into the bedclothes as he lapped at her delicious nectar, his hand seeming to support her body by her mound as he massaged her clit while feasting on her.

"Tell me," she said as he now reached under her hips, clasped hold of her waist with both hands to force her pussy hard against his mouth. "Tell me what you want most of all."

He said, "What I want most of all?"

Then he was kneeling up behind her, pushing her knees even further apart, guiding his massively hard cock to her tight pussy, and thrust forward, forcing an ecstatic cry from her as he penetrated her.

"What I want," he said, "is to see you have an affair."

Chapter One from Madeleine Strays (Book Three of the Madeleine Trilogy)

It started on a Tuesday evening as the final month of the year arrived.

Hugo returned home after work to find Madeleine sitting at the little dining table between the TV area of the living room and the window seat. They didn't really use that table other than for holding a fruit bowl—most of the time eating meals on the sofa in front of the television. But here was Madeleine, having drawn out one of the chairs usually tucked tidily under the table, sitting there peering at the screen of her little MacBook.

She didn't even look up as her husband returned home from another hard day at the office, she was so absorbed.

She was wearing her glasses, which she also didn't usually do either unless she was tired—or down. In fact, Hugo realized that they hadn't really made much of an appearance in New York, certainly ever since she'd gotten her job at the bookstore. She looked cute in them—bookish, which seemed appropriate given her profession—and the look was emphasized by a high ponytail that seemed to be a light-hearted touch for Madeleine, but to Hugo gave her a coquettish hint.

“What are you up to?” he asked her quietly, dropping his briefcase by the front door.

“Oh, nothing much. I found this website.”

He took a few paces over toward the sofa, and now saw that Madeleine was wearing no pants. She sat in a white t-shirt, but after an initial moment where he thought she was naked, a couple of blinks confirmed that no, her shapely thighs were covered by pale pink leggings as she sat there, one hand subtly tucked between, the kind she'd wear to the gym.

What was she doing?

“It's called Mary-Kay. It's a dating site.”

Hugo felt that oh-so-familiar flip-flop in his stomach, and a stirring between his legs. Dating site?

She must have picked up on his pause, seeing it as a hesitation. She said defensively, “We did talk about trying a stranger?”

Instantly he said, “Uh... Yeah... Of course.”

Trying to reassure her, spike any possibility she might think he disapproved. But Jesus, he thought to himself. This was really happening?

He approached her, placing his hands gently on her shoulders as he looked down at her screen, which was displaying a website designed tastefully in a lot of white with hints of pink and gray, which might have been an online florist or a wedding photographer's site except that instead of floral bouquets or wedding packages for sale, the site seemed to be offering a whole load of different men for Madeleine's perusal.

Hugo felt that familiar tingling pressure between his legs as his cock began to stiffen.

“A dating site, huh?” he said, trying to sound calm, interested but not panicking, despite the canon fire going off inside his chest. “So these are all what, potential dates?”

He gently massaged her shoulders and the back of her neck to underline his approval, his reassurance.

“It's a dating site especially for extra-marital affairs,” she said, and he saw her shuffle her thighs together as though trying to cope with her own arousal. “I was actually wondering if you felt like helping me pick someone.”

Hugo's eye casually tumbled through the headshots listed up on Madeleine's screen. Shots of men that she might decide to ask out, to share an evening, a nice dinner and some drinks, a few numbers on the dance floor and a taxi home. Men she might go home with, strip for, take inside her until she was screaming out their name.

"Sure," he said, leaning down to kiss the side of her neck, breathing in a hint of her perfume, yet also detecting the subtle scent of her arousal in the air.

As he kissed her, a glance down her top showed tempting cleavage bound in a sports bra, but somehow her nipples were just about visible through it.

She must have been seriously turned on.

Taking in the clues of her sports bra and leggings, he deduced: "You been to the gym this evening, honey?"

She smiled, looked up at him. "Yeah," she said with that naughty lilt in her voice. "You think that got me thinking about dating?"

"Didn't it? It's been a while since we talked about maybe looking at this."

She laughed, "Okay, maybe I was there. Maybe it made me hurry back here instead of taking my usual swim."

He smiled, "And now you're looking at lots of hot guys you might want to date?"

"Something like that. You want to take this into the bedroom?"

"Sure."

She got up, and Hugo nearly choked as he saw the damp patch between her thighs. This girl was seriously turned on.

"Coming?" she asked him, walking straight past without apparently noticing that he'd seen just how wet she was already.

Hugo felt as though he'd crossed over into some bizarre other world as he quietly followed Madeleine through to the bedroom, her laptop clutched under her arm.

Were they really about to pick out a date for Madeleine, some lucky guy for her to seduce? It felt completely unreal. But here they were, Madeleine slumping down on her front on the mattress, opening her laptop to expose that dangerous website, which must have caused so much marital strife if it specialized in adulterous affairs.

Hugo lay beside her, his arm over her shoulders, one leg slipping over her nearest thigh, so that he was almost spooning her as they both looked at the Internet browser and the list of potential dates.

“So how far have you got?” he asked her, feeling things inside him churning and fluttering at the thought that his wife was using a dating site that sported the slogan “Enjoy life now—have an affair”.

“Well, I registered for the site, as you can see. Had to create a profile to do that...”

She clicked through to show him her page. The butterflies stirred in his chest as he viewed her details. She’d called herself ‘SexySiren31’, and included a headshot photograph Hugo didn’t recognize. When had she had that taken? Her eyes in the picture were blocked out by a black ellipse, but anyone viewing would be able to see how attractive she was.

Some straightforward details about her age, location, gender, smoking habits, height and weight came alongside her photo, along with a category called “Seeking” under which she’d put short or long-term affair. Jesus.

Then underneath that, there was a box which stated boldly: “Things I’m open to trying”. Hugo felt his manhood thicken up as he scanned through her suggestions. Setting aside the more nonthreatening answers like kissing, cuddling, and sensual massage, Madeleine had included certain things Hugo might have expected—conventional sex, like to give oral sex, likes to receive oral sex, experimenting with sex toys, even blindfolding and bondage, although those were something they hadn’t really experimented with.

There were a few things that had perhaps been prompted by their recent games—likes to be watched, role playing of course, but also open to experimentation.

But she'd also included a few things that made his eyes bulge. Curious about domination, curious about submission were there, as was threesome and anal sex, which was something they'd never done.

"Threesome, huh?" he said to her, pressing his hardness against her thigh.

She laughed, and wiggled her butt, which meant her body rubbing against his erect cock. "Don't want them to think I'm boring," she said.

"So what comes next?" he asked her, squeezing her gently in his arms, pressing his face to her cheek to kiss her.

"I search for my ideal man," she said, clicking through to the search page.

"And he is..." Hugo smiled, kissed her.

"I don't know... tall, dark and handsome?" she said. "Fit, tanned, impressive in bed?"

"Sounds like there's one of those across the street," Hugo said, and saw Madeleine gently blush.

"Well," she said, "we're not going there, are we? I think we'll both feel safer with someone who doesn't hang out at my bookstore on a regular basis."

Hugo felt a slight pressure inside his chest merely from the fact that Madeleine saw Connor as a danger. It made him wonder whether the younger man from across the way might tempt her into a little more than just a one night stand if she gave him the chance. Sure, that did scare him, but it also excited him.

Madeleine put her requirements into the search boxes—tall, athletic, 25 to 50 years of age.

"Fifty?" Hugo said. "You want somebody that old?"

She smiled, said, “A little life experience—you know that could be sexy. A few gray hairs.”

Hitting the search button brought up a list of potential suitors. Madeleine flicked down through the list to the ones with pictures, but nothing seemed to catch her interest. There seemed to be a lot of guys on this service who were reluctant to include their faces in their photos, using either cut-off pictures, ridiculous looking masks, or photos that kept their faces in the dark or otherwise obscured.

“Do you really want to be with a guy who is already in a relationship?” Hugo asked her.

Again, the new search brought many profiles without a photo, and Madeleine skipped straight past them. On the next page of results, she scrolled down and actually found a youngish-looking guy from Queens, who had an easy-going kind of face, slightly wild overlong hair with a bit of a lazy quiff, and shades to slightly obscure his looks. He looked to Hugo a little like a Beat Poet, someone who might have hung out with Kerouac or Ginsberg in the 50s.

“How come these guys still block out their faces?” Hugo asked. “They’re all single...”

“Fearful of vengeful husbands, I guess,” Madeleine laughed as she looked at her husband, who was the very antithesis of vengeful.

The guy’s preferences box seemed to list most—if not all—the same tastes as Madeleine, Hugo noticed.

His message was that he’d recently moved back to the area and was looking to meet up with new people, keep it simple with no strings. It made Hugo wonder why he was particularly interested in married or attached women—you didn’t use this website merely for dating single women.

Madeleine hit the button add to favorites, and Hugo felt a little ripple of fear and excitement jaunt through his body.

“You do that, honey.”

Hugo could no longer lie idly by her side. As she scrolled through all the tall dark and handsome strangers listed on her screen, he peeled off her top, and began to massage her shoulders and her back. She moaned as he coaxed her muscles, and was clearly enjoying his treatment of her while she cast her eyes on various men that some day she might want to sleep with.

When he reached for the bedside table to retrieve the small bottle of massage oil in there, he found she had already removed her sports bra.

It was a joy to touch her, to feel her smooth skin, and have her respond to his touch.

He massaged the muscles in her legs, and found himself sliding his face along her thighs, seeking out that wicked scent coming from her damp sex.

“How about this one?” she asked as he touched her. He pulled one of her knees up so that her legs could part, giving him easier access to her pussy.

“Looks good, honey,” he said. Her choices all seemed similar—showing a clear difference from her husband—yet a nobvious hint of Connor. Was she embracing the difference between these guys and himself? Did it matter?

He loved that she was doing this—actually looking for the right man with whom to explore The Fantasy. But his focus was increasingly less on the stream of guys she was looking at, and more at the beautiful goddess lying under him.

He dipped his nose between her thighs and inhaled her sexy scent, but unable to resist, he reached up to peel down her leggings, along with her drenched panties, and then while she shortlisted a handful of men she intended to send messages through the website, Hugo prized apart her legs, pushed up her hips and ducked down to taste her flaming hot pussy.

She raised her own hips a little more as he ate her, her moans telling him all he needed to know about how he was making her feel while she played with her dating website.

He couldn't resist feasting on her while she was busy checking out an array of studs she might choose to fuck. It just seemed wrong on so many levels. He turned onto his back so he could slide under her for easier access, and she rested her pussy on his face while she continued with her website.

She was so wet, and the way she was unable to keep from gently writhing as he tasted her tangy slit was so appealing to him.

After a while, he heard her giggling, felt her whole body shivering from it. He rose to find out what she was up to.

"I have three guys trying to ask me out," she said, giving him an impish grin that revealed how naughty she felt.

"You've been emailing them?" he asked.

"They have a messaging thing, like a Skype chat kind of thing."

She closed her laptop, frustrating Hugo, who wanted to see what his wife was saying to other men, what the other men were saying to try to get her interested in a date. But he didn't want her to feel she was being supervised. In this, he felt it important to let her reveal what she wanted to reveal.

She turned onto her back, and following her signals, he lay between her thighs and slid his swollen manhood inside her, in awe at how wet she was.

"You think you might want to go out with any of them?" he asked her breathlessly as they moved together.

“Maybe,” she said cryptically. “I told one of them you were licking my pussy while I was looking for a date.”

Hugo laughed. “I bet he thought you were a bad girl.”

She smiled. “He asked about you—I guess it just slipped out. Only seemed to encourage him.”

“Wow. So what happens next?”

“If you’re okay with it, perhaps I’ll suggest some dinner Saturday night.”

“He had a photo?”

“Of course, I don’t look at the ones without.”

“Show me.”

She rolled over and opened her laptop, pulling up the profile of a guy who said he was 33, single but looking for a married woman or a couple.

Straddling her as she lay on her front, he lodged his hard cock between her buttocks for a moment, until she wiggled her behind again, urging him to slide back inside her. Though she kept her legs together, she was so wet he simply glided into her, filling her completely as she tapped out a suggestion for a dinner date.

Hugo was so stoked as he thrust inside her, seeing her gazing at the photograph of a man she could be dating—a man who might just screw her senseless.

The reply from this stranger came quickly. Madeleine clicked it, shooting him a look over her shoulder. She read his response aloud. “I’d love to...”

Her orgasm took them both by surprise, abrupt and hard, a moment before Hugo found himself exploding inside her.

He felt so big, so powerful as he pumped his hot seed inside her, like some alpha male in an animal pack out in the wild, marking his territory.

Wondering if the next weekend might find another man here between her legs, giving her this flushed look of exultant jubilation after bringing her to the most almighty orgasm.

Acknowledgements

As we continue this trilogy, I am obliged to kneel before Zod and thank a few people to whom I am indebted for their support in the creation of Madeleine Plays.

The most important support of all has come from my wife, who allows me the space to write these stories with her acceptance of what I do, the self-belief to continue thanks to her enjoyment of these books, and the motivation to write with the hope that I might drive her imagination wild.

My editor for this trilogy, Kenny Wright, who has also produced the elegant covers, has been hugely important to this book, both in his own enjoyable stories celebrating insatiable wives and in his discussions and comments during the writing of the Madeleine story.

I'd like to thank everyone at KW Publishing for the production effort in getting the story out into the wide world with the minimum of fuss.

And of course, not forgetting you, Dear Reader, who make this all worthwhile by taking the time to cast your eyes over my words. You've come this far, I promise that the third part of this trilogy will deliver on the hopes and expectations you had coming into this. It won't be another Matrix Revolutions.

If you have enjoyed this second book in the trilogy (and for the purposes of fairness, even if you haven't), and you find yourself with a spare moment on your hands, please do jot down a quick review where you bought the book. It ultimately helps others find this story for themselves, and means I can spend more time writing further stories for your enjoyment in future.
